

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

39.

525.

BIRTHS,
DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
" SAYINGS & DOINGS ;" " MAXWELL ;" " JACK BRAG ;"
&c.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. I.

LONDON:
RICHARD BENTLEY, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

1839.

525.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

CHAPTER I.

“ You are a very wise gentleman !—and a very fine gentleman !—at least in your own conceit : nevertheless, ‘Pride will have a fall,’ and you and your daughter will live to repent what you are doing : that you may rely upon. However, it is no affair of mine : I don’t care, it won’t hurt me.”

So said Mr. Jacob Batley to his brother John, during one of many discussions in which they were in the habit of indulging, touching their worldly pursuits. Jacob was a merchant who had made a fortune and retired. John, a younger son, had entered life in a Government-office, had held place under a feverish administration, and had for some time represented one of those select but judicious constituencies to which the nation is indebted for its final knowledge of the merits and powers of such men as Pitt and Fox, Burke, Sheridan, Brougham, Romilly, and indeed of all men of genius and ability, against whom the doors of the House of Commons would have been closed if each of their discriminating patrons had not chanced to have a private key of them in their pockets.

The different courses which the brothers had pursued had naturally produced a wide and striking difference in their habits and manners, their modes of thinking and of acting. Jacob, who had stuck to the shop till it grew into a warehouse and he himself was transformed from a trader to a merchant, was one of those men who are coiled, as it were, within themselves, and, like that little animal which is classically known and delicately called the Oniscus Armadillo, roll themselves up out of harm's way the moment anything like trouble or danger approaches.

John, on the contrary, was polished, politic, and plausible: he could promise with fluency, and refuse with grace and elegance. He had flirted, and loved, and married a beauty, who had left him a widower with one daughter. All he had to live upon was the well-merited pension which his services had secured him; nor had he, in more profitable times, done anything in the way of what Jacob called "laying by something for a rainy day," so that his beautiful and accomplished child, besides her face, figure, and accomplishments, had nothing in the way of fortune except that which her uncle Jacob at his death might bequeath her.

Hence the frequent invitations of Jacob to John's house; hence the passive submission with which John heard the lectures of his wealthy relation, feeling at the same time for all his worldly maxims and prudential recommendations the most sovereign contempt.

Jacob was perfectly aware of the inducements which actuated John in all his proceedings towards him, and chuckled at his own perception, and perhaps at the anticipation of the disappointment of his brother's expectations, which, after all, might occur.

“ I tell you, Jack,” continued Jacob, “ you are wrong : — it is nothing to me ; but it's all nonsense filling the girl's head with notions of high connexions and titles, and all such trumpery—your carriages and your horses, and your dinners — psha ! — you can't afford it ; and what's worse, you sin with your eyes open — you know you can't afford it.”

“ My dear brother,” said John, who seldom ventured to call his impracticable relation by his Christian name, “ I really do nothing more than is expected of a man holding a certain place in society.”

“ Expected by whom ? ” said Jacob.

“ The world,” replied John.

“ The world ! ” said Jacob — “ umph ! You mean the two or three hundred families that live up in this part of the town, not one of whom would care if you and your daughter were barred-up in Newgate. The world ! — what would the world do for your child if you were to die in debt, as you will ? You are insolvent now, and you know it. All these trumpery things about your rooms that have cost you mints of money, wouldn't fetch five-and-twenty per cent. of their prime cost at auction whenever you break-up or die."

"Nay, but"——

"'Nay, but,'" said Jacob—"that's it: you won't hear reason. Have you insured your life?"

"Why, there's a difficulty," said John——

"To be sure," interrupted Jacob: "you have ruined your constitution by early dissipation, and now your life's not worth a farthing."

"But, my dear brother," said John, "it would be impossible to bring Helen forward if I did not indulge a little in the gaieties of the world."

"There goes 'the world' again," said Jacob: "I'm sick of the word."

"When my girl is established," said John, "I shall, of course, alter the whole establishment, and live quietly."

"But how is she to be established?" said Jacob. "She has no money; and where are you to find the man who will take her as he would buy a doll, without a dump? She might marry one man I know of, and he right well to do. To be sure, he is rather old, blinking a little as to his eyes, and a bit gone in his mind, — but that's just it. The alderman, I do think" —

"The alderman!" said John, casting a withering look at his brother — "Helen marry an alderman!"

"Yes, and jump to get him," said Jacob. "What better do you propose?"

"Why," said John, looking carefully round the room, and finally closing one of the doors which stood half-open, "she has two lovers at this very moment—both capital matches. You see them here constantly, — one, Lord Ellesmere, and the other, Colonel Mortimer. The genuineness of her character, and the openness of her disposition, render the concealment of her feelings a very serious effort; and, as I leave her free and uncontrolled in the exercise of her judgment in such matters, it is not difficult for me to pronounce that Mortimer is her favourite."

“Colonel Mortimer,” said Jacob, “is the man, I think, who ran away with somebody’s wife—plays a good deal, runs horses, sails yachts, and all that sort of thing, eh?”

“It is the same Colonel Mortimer,” said John, “who did all these things, but so entirely changed, that not a vestige of his former character remains. He married the lady, who, in point of fact, ran away with him: they subsequently lived happily together, in the most domestic manner, and he nearly died of an illness brought on by the loss of her.”

“Very fine—very fine indeed!” said Jacob: “that’s your version of the history, is it? He runs away with his friend’s wife; they live domestically—that is, because ‘the world’ won’t visit her; she dies—perhaps of a broken heart,—and he is near going off the same way from remorse: mayn’t that be true? It’s all nothing to me; nothing will ever break my heart; and I never mean to run away with anybody’s wife: only, if I had a daughter, I would sooner cut her legs off than let her marry such a man.”

“I assure you,” said John, “that I have spoken upon this very subject to one or two women of the world "——

" 'The world !' — there you go again."

" Well, but what I mean is, women who really understand the ways of society, and they all agree in the eligibility of the match; and since you doubt the possibility of Helen, without a fortune, marrying a rich man, I may as well say at once that Mortimer has at least ten thousand a-year unincumbered."

" That 's it," said Jacob — " there it is. Now I see; you sell your daughter for her share of ten thousand a-year."

" Nay, but," said John, " if Helen is attached to him — if the affection be mutual, surely the ten thousand pounds per annum are not objections to her marrying the man who has them."

" Not if the man were what a girl ought to love," said Jacob. " Now, Alderman Haddock is a man"——

" My dear brother," said John, " if you are not joking, do not talk of such a thing."

" A quiet, comfortable establishment, — everything her own way," said Jacob : " a capital house in Bedford Square, with a nice garden behind, and a beautiful villa close by Hornsey Wood."

" Your picture is tempting, I admit," said John ; " but I fear the pursuits of such a life would not be congenial."

" Congenial, — pah !" said Jacob : " I've done. I can't marry a rake, and have my heart broken : of course, it 's nothing to me. I don't care three straws for anybody in the world ; only, if I could have got the girl out of harm's way, and settled her snug and comfortable, it would have been a good job. However, that 's over ; let her marry the Colonel. I know no ill of him ; he never cheated me out of my money — never shall : not to be had. I have no daughter — that's another good thing : however, I 'll tell Haddock he has no chance."

" What !" said John, " did he ever think he had ?"

" Think !" said Jacob, " what should an alderman who has passed the chair, think ? — why, exactly as I do — that she would not have hesitated a moment. However, it's nothing to me: I can't marry an alderman, so I don't care; only" —

Now, the truth is, that the younger of the two middle-aged Messrs. Batley would infinitely rather have seen his daughter starve than marry her to this Alderman Haddock; and of this the elder of the Messrs. Batley was perfectly aware: and another truth is, that Helen herself participated most cordially in her father's feelings. Jacob, however, felt it his duty to himself to express his opinion and make his suggestions, inasmuch as the manner in which the one was treated and the others were received would fully justify him in doing as he pleased with the fortune which he had himself acquired by his industry.

Her uncle Jacob was no great favourite of Helen's. His rough, almost uncouth manners ill-agreed with her notions of society; and his appearance in the domestic circle, when it happened to be enlivened by any of her more worldly acquaintances, was extremely disagreeable. Nor did the constant efforts of her well-bred father entirely succeed in concealing this feeling from Jacob himself: it was therefore doubly important to him, if possible, to secure a parti for the young lady, whose fortune might enable him to remove her from the chance of becoming dependent upon his worthy brother. Every day convinced him more and more of the importance of such an arrangement, inasmuch as every day, as it passed, threw some new light upon his daughter's disinclination towards her uncle, from whom, it should be observed, not a syllable or monosyllable in the way of promise, or even hint at the probable disposition of his great wealth, had ever dropped.

The period then had arrived when the lovely Miss Batley found at her feet two pretenders to her hand — and heart. Lord Ellesmere was dull, heavy, and, if he had not been a lord, would most probably have been reckoned stupid. He had, however, as all dull, heavy lords have, his admirers, his puffers, his toadies, and his followers; but, whatever they might say of his morals and his virtues, it went but a very little way to counteract the movements of the gay and gallant Colonel Mortimer. It is true, the title and coronet were in one scale, and nothing but a commoner's fortune in the other ; still the fortune was considerable, and thus it was that Helen lived in a state of perpetual agitation, expecting every day to be called upon to decide between their comparative attractions.

Batley was a Whig — Lord Ellesmere a violent Tory. The Colonel sympathized in politics with Batley, and this was an additional claim in his favour ; besides which, his agreeable manners and conversational qualities rendered him particularly acceptable as a son-in-law. In short, Batley had more than implied to Helen which way his prepossession lay ; and even if he had not, the warmth with which he uniformly received her untitled suitor must have convinced her, as, in fact, it had convinced everybody of their acquaintance, that he was the husband elect, as far as the future father-in-law was concerned.

And now for Helen herself : — she was beautiful, highly accomplished, and naturally gifted. Constantly associated with her father since her mother's death, her mind had naturally received its impressions from him: her views of "the world," as her uncle Jacob would sneeringly have said, were in perfect accordance with his; and the result of this sympathy and similarity of feeling was, the acquirement of a tone of thought and conversation which, to strangers who did not know the excellence of her heart, gave her an air of what might be colloquially called, "off-handishness." But below the surface lay the precious metal of which her character was really formed. She was kind, generous, liberal, and good, in the fullest sense of all these words; but her playfulness and gaiety of manner, generally delighting and captivating as they were, not unfrequently met with the reproof of some, while they dazzled the eyes of many, even to a blindness to the mild radiance of her innate merits and virtues.

Helen had, before she was eighteen, been flattered, praised, and almost beatified. Odes had been written on her eyes, and sonnets addressed to her eyebrows: ponderous lines "To Helen Dancing," and elaborated extempores "On Hearing Helen Sing," had graced the Annuals. Helen had been painted by Lawrence, drawn by Chalon, enamelled after Lawrence by Bone, engraved after Chalon by Finden, mezzotinted by Cousins, and lithographed by Lane. Dances had been dedicated to her, and collections of poems inscribed to her: in short, all that could have well been done to turn the head of a young lady of her time of life had been tried,—and yet Helen remained, in fact, unspoiled.

It was quite clear to "the world," about the period at which Jacob and John maintained the conversation with which this volume begins, that the suspense in which they, as well as the two parties more intimately concerned, were kept with regard to Miss Helen's selection, must very speedily be terminated. For once "the world" was right: the initiative was taken by the young lady some three nights afterwards at an assembly, where Lord Ellesmere became so "very particular" in his manner and conversation to Helen, that she was compelled to convince him, in the most unequivocal manner, of the hopelessness of his case,—a determination on her part which was formally ratified the next morning by her fond parent, who thus saw the last obstacle to the consummation of his wishes with regard to Mortimer removed. It is not often that a father, especially one of such pretensions as Mr. John Batley, rejoices in the rejection of a lord by a “gentle belle” who happens to be his daughter; personal esteem, however, and the belief that Helen’s happiness would be more unequivocally secured by her union with his lordship’s rival, were the bases upon which his satisfaction was founded: and when the disconsolate Baron drove from the door for the last time, Mr. John Batley kissed Helen’s flushed cheek in a manner perfectly indicative of his full sanction of, and entire concurrence in, the line of conduct she had adopted.

Strange to say, that on the day in which this eventful rejection took place, Colonel Mortimer did not call in Grosvenor Street. Helen waited, and lingered. The horses were at the door, — her father ready to accompany her : — she declined riding, insinuating something about an apparent indelicacy in showing herself so immediately after having broken a heart. Dressing-time came : — no Mortimer ! Dinner-time : — no Mortimer ! What could have happened ? Surely she could not have deceived herself into a false belief of his affection for her : surely Papa (a man of the world) could not have so widely miscalculated as not to have assured himself of the seriousness of his intentions. Had his absence anything to do with Lord Ellesmere's rejection, or with her conduct the preceding evening ? That Lord Ellesmere was rejected, seemed to be the only certainty in the midst of all these speculations — that was, of course, irrevocable — but if Mortimer should really intend nothing ? — what else could it mean ? — Helen began to think that she had been hasty. Lord Ellesmere, to speak considerately, was not so very stupid a companion — nor so very violent a politician ; and, at all events, he was a Peer, and his wife would be a Peeress : — and Helen was out of spirits, and even went the full length of crying for vexation at what had happened.

Mr. John Batley most assuredly did not cry, —but Mr. John Batley was particularly uneasy: still, Colonel Mortimer never could have gone so far in his attentions, and even professions, as he had, unless—— And yet,—to be sure, there might still remain a dash of the roué in his character. He had the reputation of being a lady-killer, —and it certainly looked odd: —it might have happened that he had heard of what had occurred in the family, and had thought proper to retire as soon as he found the field his own. In short, it was altogether an unaccountable, and by no means an agreeable circumstance. No man alive was more likely to feel deeply the frustration of his designs in such a matter than Batley: the mortification of being deceived by appearances, would of itself be a deadly pang, —for Batley was, at least in his own opinion, extremely like Ben Johnson's Bias,

“ The very agate
Of State and Policy ; cut from the quar'
Of Machiavel, a true Cornelian

As Tacitus himself; and to be made
The brooch to any true State-cap in Europe.
He is unvaluable. All the Lords
Have him in that esteem, for his Relations, Corrants, Avises, Correspondences With this Ambassador, and that Agent. He Will screw you a secret from a Statist
So easie as some Cobbler worms a dog."

To have been out-manœuvred by the Colonel would naturally lie heavy on his heart; and such were the irascible feelings by which he was agitated, that the night closed upon him with a determination on his part to demand an explanation of conduct which seemed so entirely irreconcilable with honour and the ways of "the world."

Poor Helen's thoughts were differently directed. Her affection for Mortimer was warm and sincere; the extraordinary evidence of his neglect, so suddenly inflicted, agitated her dreadfully; and the womanly mortification, which in the day had been excited by wounded pride, was transformed before the next morning into an agonizing conviction that she had eternally lost the only man she had ever loved.

After a restless, wretched night, came on another day, — but not Mortimer; and neither Helen nor her father, (both equally anxious on the subject,) ventured to propose to the other, any measure calculated to relieve their suspense: even Batley himself, having slept off his chivalrous resolution of the preceding evening, began to consider the inexpediency, if not absurdity, of making an appeal to Mortimer on a subject with regard to which he had made no kind of declaration; and Helen, whose heart beat rapidly during the ceremonial of breakfast, would have suffered it to break before she would consent to take any step which could, by the remotest possibility, be supposed by “the world” to arise from a wish to recall her truant lover.

The suspense, however, which was so irksome, was very speedily converted into a certainty, which was something worse. The arrival of that invaluable record of all “worldly” proceedings, “The Morning Post” newspaper, settled the question. In its fashionable columns appeared the following paragraph, the perusal of which, in spite of all efforts at repression of feeling, drove Mr. Batley into an agony of rage, and threw Miss Helen into something very like a fit of hysterics.

“Colonel Mortimer left London yesterday for Brighton, on his way to Dieppe, from which place he proceeds on a lengthened tour through the continent of Europe.”

This of itself would have been quite sufficient to produce even more serious effects, but, as the French say, “Malheur ne vient jamais seul ;” and just as Jack had soothed his daughter into a state of consciousness, and resolved to re-read the “extremely disagreeable” announcement previously to discussing it, his eyes, missing their aim at the particular passage, just glanced upon another which was about half a superficial inch lower down in the column, and read —

“It is confidently reported that Lord Ellesmere is immediately to be created an Earl.”

This was something beyond endurance — beyond belief, indeed ! The first impression upon Batley’s mind was, that the circumstance could not be accidental — that some malicious demon had placed the two articles of intelligence in juxta-position, and perhaps invented them both. Ay, — if that were true : — the drowning man caught at the straw — but it saved him not ; — both the recorded facts were incontrovertible.

“ Did you see this, Helen ? ” said Batley to his daughter.

“ See it ! — yes,” said Helen, believing that her excited parent alluded to the defection of the Colonel.

“ The idea of making him an earl ! ” said Batley — “ what will they do next ? ”

“ What ! — who an earl ? ” said Helen.

“ Your discarded friend Ellesmere,” was the reply, and “ The Morning Post ” was handed to Helen, in order that she might satisfy herself upon that point ; her tear-dimmed eyes, however, rested instinctively upon the one loved word : with Isabel she could have said —

“ Walk forth, my loved and gentle Mortimer,
And let these longing eyes enjoy their feast.”

But, alas ! her “ loved and gentle Mortimer ” was now beyond her reach—beyond recall ; and when she came in time to read the announcement of his rival's approaching elevation in the peerage, she felt no pang of regret like that her father had endured, at the loss of rank she had sustained by her rejection of his lordship ; for, had he been a Prince, and the competitor for her heart with Mortimer, his fate and her decision would have been the same as it had been.

“ It seems, Helen, that something strange has happened,” said Batley : — “ have you and Mortimer quarrelled ?”

“ On the contrary,” said Helen, who talked fluently in his praise as a friend ; “ I never saw him in better spirits, or in better temper, than on Wednesday morning when he was here.”

“ Did you see him at Lady Saddington's ?” said Batley.

“ No,” replied Helen : “ he said he should be there, and perhaps was ; but, you know, I came away early, and he is generally very late.”

“ Yes,” said Batley. “ I begin to wish that you had not been quite so decisive : Ellesthere is a man not to be rejected — and —— but, however, we certainly were not aware of this.”

“ My dearest father,” said Helen, “ let what may be the result, I never shall, — never can repent the course I have adopted. You have taught me to speak to you frankly upon all topics affecting my happiness, and I have no disguises from you. I never could have altered the sentiments I at this moment entertain for Lord Ellesmere, and I am sure it would have been unkind, as well as indelicate, to have permitted him to continue in doubt upon the subject one moment longer, after what occurred at that party.”

“ I find no fault, Helen,” said Batley ; “ I have always desired you to think for yourself : but still it appears to me, that however sincere you may have been in the expression of your feelings towards the man who is indifferent to you, you have been less candid with regard to him who, if I know anything of “ the world ” generally, and of you particularly, occupies a very different place in your estimation.”

“Equally sincere, believe me, my dear father,” said Helen. “I never disguised, — in fact, there was no reason why I should disguise the pleasure I derived from the society of Colonel Mortimer. From all you had said, I concluded that you had no objection to his constant visits here, and therefore, so far from affecting an indifference which I did not feel, I have treated him in a manner perfectly consistent with the opinion I entertained of him.”

“And now, tell me, Helen,” said Batley, — “in the course of your numerous conversations has he ever alluded, — seriously, I mean, — to the probable result of your intimate acquaintance? — has he, in fact, led you to believe that that result would be a proposal of a similar nature to that of Lord Ellesmere? — or”——

“Why, my dear father,” said Helen, “Mortimer’s manner, and conversation, and accomplishments, are all so exceedingly unlike those of Lord Ellesmere, that it is impossible for me to establish a comparison between them in my mind. Mortimer, as far as I am concerned, has never practised what ‘the world,’ I believe, calls making love. He is extremely agreeable — delightful! — and I tell you very honestly, I never saw anybody I liked so much; — and I — am ——— In fact, my dear father, you have seen the progress of our intimacy, — and I — admit the —”——

And here Helen, who had endeavoured with all her energy to keep up this description of her feelings with every possible gaiety, and had so far, to a certain extent, succeeded, fell into a second hysteric fit, the aggravated symptoms of which, rendered it necessary to ring for her maid, with whose assistance and that of her father she was removed to her room.

When Batley had assured himself of his daughter's convalescence, and that rest and quiet only were essential to her restoration, he proceeded to his library, to think over what had happened, and, if possible, decide upon his future course of proceeding. The marriage of his daughter to Mortimer was the great object of his ambition, and he had now for some time so perfectly satisfied himself that things were en train, and going on as well as possible, that the sudden shock occasioned by the departure of the lover, as he had considered him, was not at all alleviated by Helen's description of the nature and character of his attentions, and he began to apprehend that the tender feeling in the affair was confined to Helen. That would, and did, naturally account for her decided rejection of Lord Ellesmere : — might it not equally account for the disappearance of Mortimer ? Might he not, seeing the marked attentions which the noble lord was paying to Helen, with an evident, and, in all probability, avowed object in view, consider himself, having no such intentions, bound in honour to withdraw ?

Batley began to fear that, for once, his knowledge of “ the world ” had failed him, and that he ought himself earlier to have brought Mortimer to some definite point ; now, it seemed wholly impracticable : he had no ground, no plea for asking him a single question touching the matter, — except, indeed, that the quitting London without either mentioning his intention, or calling to take leave of the family, putting all lover-like considerations out of the question, might justify his writing him a friendly letter of inquiry into the reason of his abruptness, in which Helen should only be mentioned incidentally. This seemed a bright thought, and the diplomate resolved to act upon it immediately ; and in order to begin his operations scientifically and in good order, he proceeded forthwith, after hearing a favourable account of his daughter's progress towards recovery, to call at the hotel whence Colonel Mortimer had taken his departure the preceding day.

The reader will please to recollect that he has been introduced to the diplomatic Mr. Batley under very peculiar circumstances ; that he has been domesticated with him in the first instance ; and that, as the proverb says, "No man is a hero to his valet-de-chambre," so no man is, as he is in "the world" while engaged in family-affairs with his own connexions and relations. Once out of his own house,—once afloat in the full tide of London-life, Batley was a different creature altogether ; and those of his acquaintance whom he chanced to meet on his way to Mortimer's hotel, every one of whom would have been too happy to take his arm and enjoy his conversation, could by no possibility form an idea of the real state of his mind, or of what was passing in it, while he, with smiles upon his countenance, and an air of gaiety and playfulness of manner, was positively distracted at the idea of losing such a prize as a husband for his daughter, who, by one of those singular coincidences that rarely occur in "the world," was equally agreeable to father and child.

Arrived at the hotel, Jack made his inquiries after the Colonel, as if he expected to find him at home.

"The Colonel left town yesterday, sir," was the answer.

"That's very odd," said Batley. "What time?"

"About half-past one, sir," said the waiter.

"Leave any letters or messages, or"——?

"None, sir," said the waiter.

"Gone to Brighton?" said Jack.

“Yes, sir,” replied the man — “gone to Brighton first, and then to France.”

“When do you expect him back?” said Mr. Batley.

“I don’t think, sir, the Colonel will be back for some time,” said the waiter.

“His servants all gone?” asked Batley.

“No, sir,” said the waiter, “his groom and the boy are not gone yet: they stay with the saddle-horses, I believe.”

“Ah!” said Batley — “where are they — here?”

“At the stables, I fancy, sir,” said the man.

“Umph!” said Batley, pausing for a moment to consider what advantage was probably derivable from any inquiries in that quarter, — for Jack was of that school which has for an axiom, the justification of the means by the attainment of the object — “Ha — well — then I’ll write. — Does not go immediately to France?”

“I think not, sir,” said the waiter, “for a day or two.”

“ Oh !” said Jack — “ thank you — thank you !” — and away he went, leaving the waiter deeply impressed with the urbanity of his manners and the extreme politeness of his behaviour. And whither went he ? — the reader anticipates, I am sure :—to the stables !—from the inmates of which he felt a hope that he might derive the most authentic information on the subject nearest his heart.

Thither he repaired, and amidst the washing of carriages, the clatter of pail-handles, and the auxiliary hissings of sundry harness-cleaners, the anxious parent ascertained that Colonel Mortimer had ordered that his horses should be sent down to his country residence, Sadgrove House, in Worcestershire ; that the carriage-horses were already gone, and that the saddle-horses were to follow the next day.

Hence did the diplomatist discover that Mortimer’s absence was not likely to be a temporary one, and that, for once, the newspapers were correct in their statement, the reason probably being that the Colonel’s own man had furnished it, leaving “ the world ” to wonder what could so suddenly have caused the occultation of so bright a planet in the hemisphere of Fashion. The conclusion discoverable from this intelligence was of the most disagreeable kind ; but it nevertheless strengthened, and before he reached home confirmed him in his determination of not losing a friend so estimable, and a companion so agreeable, as the Colonel, without one effort either to regain him or ascertain the cause of his defection. Accordingly, the diplomate sat himself down, and wrote him the following letter.

“ MY DEAR MORTIMER,

Grosvenor Street.

‘ I had a dream, which was not all a dream ;
The bright sun was extinguish’d, and the stars
Did wander, darkling, in the eternal space, Rayless and pathless.’

“ ‘ The world ’ is in ‘ amazement lost ! ’ — all London is wondering whither you are gone, and why. We are, in fact, in a total eclipse :
some folks surmise that you have not gone alone : for myself, I cannot comprehend the matter, or its suddenness. Surely, if some fancy had struck you on the minute, you would not have gone without saying 'farewell' to us.

We cannot have offended you, even if any one else has done so; and I cannot suffer you to go farther than you have already gone, without endeavouring to catch some little account of your plans for the future, and of the cause — that is, if you are not resolved to mystify the metropolis altogether — which has produced so surprising an effect.

“To me the news of your departure seemed incredible. One reason for my incredulity was, the account of its appearing somewhat authoritatively in the newspapers; and the other was, our not having received the least intimation of it from yourself, which, as Helen and I were vain enough to think ourselves something like favourites with you, has given us both a great deal of uneasiness.

“Pray write, even if it be but five lines, to let us hear what you propose doing, and whither, in fact, you are going. I admit that I am extremely anxious, because I honestly confess that I feel deeply interested in your proceedings; and trust that your strange departure is not in any way connected with the disagreements among the trustees of your Welsh property, about which you were good enough to consult me. In fact, we miss you, and want exceedingly to know why. Even poor little Fan seems to inquire after you as earnestly as Italian greyhound well can; and Helen declares that something must have affronted you. For our parts, neither I nor Helen, nor even the affectionate Italian, are conscious of having done so, and therefore those of the trio who think and recollect, are most anxious to know the real cause of your disappearance. If there should be anything in which my humble services can be made available, do not hesitate to let me know, and I will put myself at your disposal immediately.

“Helen desires her best remembrances, and adds her request to mine, that you should write by return of post, to give a true and faithful account of yourself. Pray do, and believe me, dear Mortimer, “Yours, faithfully and sincerely,

“J. BATLEY.”

“ P. S. — I see ministers are going to create Ellesmere an Earl :—what will they do next ? He is no longer a visitor here ; so that not having seen him in the course of the day, I am not certain whether the rumour is correct.”

This letter having been first submitted to Helen, who saw nothing unreasonable, remarkable, or indelicate in its contents, and who especially admired, if she did not actually originate, the postscript, was despatched in the evening to Brighton, which place in due course it reached the following morning. The effect produced by it upon the gallant Colonel remains to be seen.

CHAPTER II.

HELEN BATLEY, whose career is likely to occupy a considerable portion of the reader's attention, was singularly situated in society. From a combination of circumstances, connected in some degree with her father's wifeless condition, she possessed few, if any, female friends of her own age. She had been confided to the care of chaperons, who were either unmarried elderlies, or widows without families; and her father's house, ungraced and uncheered by the presence of a mistress, seemed to serve rather as a temporary retreat from the gaieties of "the world," than a home, under the roof of which might be associated companions of her own sex likely to sympathize with her, and become the recipients of the unreserved communication of her thoughts and feelings.

Neither were those to whom her volatile and restless father entrusted her, exactly the sort of persons to whom such a trust could advantageously be delegated; and certainly, of the whole coterie, the one least likely to do her good was the one whose society she most preferred. This, perhaps, was natural, inasmuch as she was never troubled by her favourite maternal friend with anything in the shape of advice, except as to the colour of a riband, or the texture of a dress. Lady Bembridge was a woman of "the world," as uncle Jacob would have said, who lived but for such pleasures as it could still afford to a widow of sixty. A good jointure without children, an excellent house, and a turn for ostentatious hospitality, combined to procure for her a constant round of gaiety and entertainment, in running which, her great object was to be universally popular. She was always a flatterer, and never, by the remotest accident, dealt in personalities: she always spoke hypothetically, and generally hypocritically. To be everything to everybody was her object, and therefore it is not to be imagined that she would even hazard the favourable opinion of Helen by intruding anything in the shape of corrective observation upon her. Advice, like medicine, is never palatable ; and Lady Bembridge was like the fashionable physician who first ascertains what his patient would like to eat or to drink, or what part of the world he would like to visit, before he prescribes, and then prudently directs the unconscious sufferer to do the very thing he himself wishes to do : a course of proceeding rendered more beneficial to the invalid by convincing him that his own views of his complaint, of course always favourable, are in strict accordance with those of Sir Gregory Galen, or Sir Peter Paracelsus, as the case may be.

On the morning of Batley's visit to Mortimer's hotel and stables, Lady Bembridge, much as usual, called on Helen, in order to "make arrangements," as her phrase went, for the day. In a moment she saw that Helen had been crying : she knew that Mortimer was gone, — therefore did her ladyship affect not to perceive the tear-marks in her eyes, or to own her knowledge of the Colonel's sudden departure.

"It seems to me, Helen dear," said her ladyship, "as if this evening would be a very good opportunity for the play. We have no engagement; we might dine early, and if a comfortable box were to be let, probably it might be agreeable."

"My dear Lady Bembridge," said Helen, "I could not go to the play if you were to give me the world!"

"I am sure," said Lady Bembridge, "I am not going to ask why; but I did think, that when young ladies avow themselves admirers of certain authors, there could be no great objection to their indulging themselves in seeing their best works well acted."

"Plays," said Helen, "are all very well; they interfere, however, with everything else: and—I don't know—the men who act Comedy are so vulgar; and,—as—as for Tragedy, one has enough of that in real life, without going to a theatre for it."

"I am sure, my dear Helen," said Lady

Bembridge, "I am the last person in the world, as you know, to inquire how much of tragedy mingles in the occurrences of your life; but I should really think, dear, if anything unpleasant were to occur to any young friend of mine, placed in 'the world' as you are, it must be—I know, Helen, you will pardon me, love!—it must be her own fault."

"Oh! my dear Lady Bembridge," said Helen, "indeed, indeed it is not so! No: what has happened is not my fault. Dear Lady Bembridge, I will tell you all: I am unhappy—and unhappy without having done any one single thing in the world justly to make me so. Mortimer is gone to France—gone on a tour!"

"You do not really mean that!" said Lady Bembridge, with an expression of surprise which would have done credit to the talents of a professional actress.

"True,—quite true!" said Helen: "isn't it strange!—isn't it wonderful!"

"Why, my love," said Lady Bembridge, "one cannot, you know, form an opinion hastily upon an individual case : but — now, dearest, you will see what I mean in a minute—if a very lovely girl, of about your age,—in fact, just such a girl as yourself,—encourages two men,—at least, when I say encourages, I mean, suffers the attentions of two men,—one a nobleman much distinguished in society, and the other a commoner equally celebrated in ‘the world,’ without coming to a decision, is it not possible that patience may wear out? and — I don’t mean to say”——

“ No, no, — I know you don’t, dear !” said Helen, who, when she became animated or impassioned, so called the dowager ; “ but I did no such thing. You know all about it ; you know every turn of my mind ; you know that I did decide about Lord Ellesmere ; else, my dear Lady Bembridge, why did I implore you to come away from Lady Saddington’s ?”

“ My dearest !” said her ladyship, taking Helen’s hand between her’s, “ I didn’t know anything about it. Sometimes girls have headaches, or are tired ; and when I am chaperon, I never ask why they wish me to stay late or come away early. When one sees an avowed lover, such as Lord Ellesmere has been of yours, making one of the retiring party, it is impossible to know."

"What could I do?" said Helen: "he would offer me one of his arms, and you the other: I could not make a scene in Lady Saddington's ante-room. But I told you, my dear Lady Bembridge,"——

"No, Helen dear," said Lady Bembridge, "you told me nothing. A young lady who tells me that she has been very much flurried, and in a state of agitation so peculiar that she wishes to go home, only tells me that something particularly interesting to her, has occurred, and I am left to conjecture of what particular sentiment the agitation has been indicative. I never knew, till this moment, the real truth of the story: — so, then, Ellesmere is discarded."

"Yes," said Helen — "but then Mortimer is gone! — and oh! my dear Lady Bembridge, if I have lost him by my own want of decision, — my own missishness rather, in liking to have lovers in order to tease them and please myself, I never can have a moment's happiness for the rest of my life !”

“ My dear Helen,” said the old lady, “ you must not talk in this way : I am quite sure you have nothing to reproach yourself with. To be sure, a man like Colonel Mortimer, taken even with all his imperfections on his head, is not to be found every day ; and when a young lady feels conscious that she has secured the heart of such a man, not to speak of his fortune, which, I am sure, is the last thing in the world such a girl as you would think about, she ought not to risk her own happiness and his by apparent indecision : but this does not apply to your case, dear !”

“ I cannot help thinking it does,” said Helen, “ nor can I help reproaching myself with a thousand little coquettish tricks of which I ought to have been ashamed. You know, my dear Lady Bembridge, this must have been the case, or how could Lord Ellesmere have, to the very last, fancied himself the favourite ?”

“ You must not agitate yourself,” said Lady Bembridge. “ Rely upon it, if a man like

Colonel Mortimer were really attached to such a young lady as Miss Batley, and had withdrawn himself only because he thought a rival preferred, he would, on ascertaining that that rival was dismissed, instantly return, and kneel to receive his fetters again : he couldn't help himself."

"Not," said Helen, "if he had by any chance discovered that the young lady had been playing a double game.—And that I should be that young lady, whose leading faults in 'the world' have hitherto been sincerity and frankness! I never was reproached with anything very wrong, except speaking my mind too freely; and yet—yet—here I have not been sincere."

"You see this matter in a wrong point of view," said Lady Bembridge. "Follow my advice; come and take a drive. Let us engage the box, and let us go to the play. A young lady whose avowed admirer has suddenly left town on a tour, ought not to permit 'the world' to suppose that she is affected by it."

"But I am affected by it," said Helen, and the tears ran down her cheeks, “and I cannot conceal my sorrow, even if I wished it!”

Lady Bembridge looked at her young friend with a half-serious, half-comic worldly look, and pressing her hand, said archly, as dowagers sometimes will say things—

“ ‘ The boy thus, when his sparrow’s flown,
The bird in silence eyes ;
But soon as out of sight, ’tis gone,
Whines, whimpers, sobs, and cries.’ ”

“ Lady Bembridge !” said Helen, starting from her chair, “you know I cannot bear to be laughed at !” and in the next instant she was out of the room, leaving the chaperon as much surprised at the rapidity of the young lady’s movements, as at the ill-success of her extremely ill-timed attempt at pleasantry.

Helen, however, was seriously wounded by what had occurred, and upon a mind like hers, the combination of feelings, — some perhaps not quite so amiable as others which the circumstance had excited, — operated violently. She had lost the lover of her choice, and she had discarded his rival whose peerage was at her feet ; and, as has been already observed, beyond and over-and-above the one deep grief which the former of these circumstances created, was the worldly regret that she should have thrown away the advantages of the match with Lord Ellesmere for the sake of the man who had evidently abandoned her. All this worry and excitement produced an accession of fever ; and after Lady Bembridge, who followed her to her room, had obtained pardon for her endeavour to laugh off her sorrows and remorse, she took her leave, promising to send her own favourite physician to visit her, observing as she went, “ that however incompetent the doctors might be to ‘minister to a mind diseased,’ still they were of great service in checking bodily illness caused by mental excitement.”

Helen, for the first time in the course of their acquaintance, rejoiced at her ladyship's departure. The silence of her room which succeeded to the voluble hypotheses of her “worldly” companion was of itself soothing and calming, and the poor victim to her own indecision uninterruptedly indulged in an ecstasy of tears.

It was during this time that another scene in the domestic drama was being enacted in Mr. John Batley's library, where brother Jacob, having heard the history of Mortimer's flight and Lord Ellesmere's rejection, made not a second, nor a third, but at least a twentieth effort to induce Jack to listen to Alderman Haddock's proposals for the dear deserted Dido.

"Psha, Jack!" said Jacob, "I told you so:—cat in a tripe-shop;—Jack-ass between two bundles of hay:—didn't know where to choose. No difference to me; thank God! I have no daughter: I care for nobody: but you'll see the end on't, that's all I say,—and a pretty kettle of fish you'll make of it!"

It was during such discussions as these, that Jack, the brilliant and polished, had to exercise the most rigid control over his temper, and submit with apparent patience to the dicta of the uneducated Cræsus from whom he hoped to derive eventual independence.

"My dear brother," said Batley junior,

"you are altogether misinformed. Colonel Magnus, Mortimer's particular friend and intimate acquaintance, told me this very morning that he doubted the fact of Mortimer's intended absence, and hinted to me — this, of course, is entre nous" —

"Of course," said Jacob, "whatever that means."

"Means, Jacob," said John, "why, that it goes no farther. He hinted to me that he rather thought Mortimer had an affair upon his hands, and had given out the history of his tour to mystify inquirers."

"An affair!" said Jacob—"Oh! that means, I suppose, another duel — not that it necessarily follows. An affair of honour! — an affair of gallantry. Ah! — well, you are safe with me; I sha'n't say a syllable about it. I don't care a fig if Colonel Mortimer is killed half a dozen times over; — why should I? I'm not going to fight, and haven't insured his life; it cannot make any difference, you know, to me."

"No," said Jack, "but it would make a very serious difference to Helen."

“Why,” said Jacob, “I don’t see that. She has contrived to catch two fools already,—why shouldn’t she do the same thing again?”

“My dear brother,” said Jack, “you speak of female affections as if they were as easily transferred as so much stock.”

“Stock, John!” said Jacob—“no, no: you don’t catch me comparing the fly-away fancies of a giddy girl with the four per cents, or the three and a-half reduced.”

“But the sentiment,—the feeling!” said John.

“Sentiment, my eye!” said Jacob; “I don’t understand what it means: I never knew what it was to be in love—never shall, now. I admit that I once took a fancy to a widow at Wapping, in regard of sundry ships, Class A, lying in the London Docks, of which she was mistress; but I found it wasn’t all clear and above-board,—and that she had a nephew, and there was a will to be disputed; so I left the widow and the craft:—but as for sentiment,—Lord bless your heart! she was old enough to be my grandmother, and so big that

“Not I,” said Jacob, “I never take any interest—except for my money :—and as for a brother, — why, we are all brothers, if you come to that :—and hang me if I know one of the family, large as the world is, who would stoop to pick up a pin to save my life ;— I ’m sure I wouldn’t, to save any one of theirs.”

“But, surely,” said Jack, “Helen deserves some of your affection : she is truly attached to you, and ”——

“Fudge, Jack !” said Jacob, rattling all the shillings in his breeches-pocket — “attached to me !— no, I ’m not after her fashion — I don’t live in ‘the world ’—hey ? She may be attached to me as Peter Post-Obit in the play is attached to his friends, in the hopes of what she may catch at my death :— but it won’t do ; I ’m not to be had ! No,—if she were a staid, sensible sort of body, and would marry Haddock, I should say something to her :— but, no — the alderman, like myself, is not a man of ‘the world ’ — not that I care three dumps for him, if you come to that.”

“Why,” said Jack, “Helen’s habits and wobbling with her voice, as she does of flying : it's all pretence — fighting under false colours. If Helen married Haddock "——

" My dear Jacob," again interrupted Batley junior ——

" And, my dear Jack," said Jacob, " if you come to that. — I say, even if she married this Mortimer — which, in course, she won't now, — she would never sing or play afterwards ; nor would he ask her. Everything is very fine till you have got it. A singing wife is like a piping bullfinch ; great fun for your friends, — deuced tiresome to yourself. Now, as I am all for myself, and nothing for my friends, I only speak as I think."

" My dear brother," said Jack, " upon one point I really wish to undeceive you, because, in your blunt, off-hand way of speaking, you may unintentionally do Helen and me a very serious piece of mischief, by representing the marriage between her and Mortimer as off. Colonel Magnus, his particular friend, as I have already told you "——

" Psha !" said Jacob, " Colonel Magnus !—

“ Loud in her praise !” repeated the brother ;
“ and do you give any man in this world credit for what he says ? — psha ! The world is full of cheats ;—it’s a cheat,—a great huge big cheat, itself ;—it is that makes me stand aloof from everybody : everybody who makes professions—lies ; no man, let him talk as he may, cares one straw for anything but self,—that I know. But I’m even with them : I’m like the dusty chap that lived on the river Dee ; “ I care for nobody,” — not “ if nobody cares for me,” as the miller says it, but because I know nobody does care for me : — so much the better —who wants them ?”

It is true that Mr. Jacob Batley had a somewhat forcible manner of expressing his extremely unamiable feelings and principles, but he was a shrewd observer of “ things in general,” and the estimate he had formed of the merits and virtues of Colonel Magnus was not very far from being a correct one. The Colonel had been long the intimate friend of Mortimer : they had been in the same battalion of Guards, —had lived very constantly together.

tone of his conversation was such as never to betray him into anything verging upon a falsehood, but to leave his hearers, as Jacob said, to imply and infer that he was really something to be looked-up to. This style of language, combined with a fine person, Antinous-like features, pallid cheeks, an immoveable steadiness and almost scornfulness of countenance, gave him a kind of swaggering importance in general society, in which, it must be owned, he mightily rejoiced. How far his influence over Mortimer, superadded to his knowledge of his foregone indiscretions, contributed to the events hereafter to be detailed, is not at present to be ascertained; suffice it to say, that Colonel Mortimer seldom acted in any important case, without having first asked and received the advice of Colonel Magnus.

It was quite in the natural order of things that nothing like congeniality should exist between the two colonels and such a person as Mr. Jacob Batley. The old citizen, always on the alert, was by far too quick and discerning not to discover the precise place which he held in their estimation, and this knowledge gave increased force to his natural feelings of misanthropy, or rather self-love, — for the fact is, he did not so much hate other people as love himself.

“Well,” said the worthy citizen, “I wish you well out of it. You are in what I call a mess — but you won’t take advice, and I can’t afford time to waste it upon you if you would : — no, — go your own way, it’s nothing to me : I don’t care whether she marries either, both, or neither. I know I have got a deuced good dinner to eat at Haddock’s at six, and a capital bottle of Port to drink after it, and a snatch of supper if I want it, and a glass of punch, beyond that ; and a comfortable bed to go to afterwards, in as snug a house as ever was built — that’s enough for me. I have put myself out of harm’s way — sunk enough in Annuities to keep me safe for the rest of my life ; and as that’s the case, Jack, blow high, blow low, all’s one to Jacob :—wherefore, good morning ! I shall look in to-morrow or next day. I suppose I shall hear how you get on — not that that's what I come for, only, I like an object when I want a walk, and so I come to inquire—ha, há! Good b'ye t'ye, Jack — good b'ye!"

"Strange, unaccountable creature!" muttered Jack, as he rang the bell for the servant to let his brother out. "Is it the possession of wealth that steels the heart against mankind, or is it the knowledge, gained by that possession, of the greedy rapacity of the world, which puts the rich man on his guard against its impositions? I, if I ever had a guinea in the world that I could call my own, was never easy till it was gone; and often have I shared it with a poorer friend, or even given it all away to some deserving object,—at least, as I fancied;—and here is this brother of mine, rolling in riches, a perfect callosity as far as sympathy, compassion, or feeling go. Well, I would not change with him even now."

This being spoken in a soliloquy, Jack's effusion, so favourable to himself, will pass uncensured on the score of vanity or vain-boasting:

intelligence of our friend, from whom, however, I expect to hear every hour. The fact is, that I have heard you express a wish to be again in Parliament: — now I think I have an opportunity of, — I won't say, returning you, — not actually that, — but of putting things so favourably en train, that little doubt can be entertained of success."

"Why," said Jack, his eyes brightening at the prospect of again sitting in the Wittenagemote of the empire, "I admit that I should be disposed to enter into any negociation that way tending, not from any personal vanity, but because I think, — of course what I say is entirely private and confidential, — that I might be of use: — I have been behind the curtain, and might perhaps turn the experience I have gained to some account in just picking holes in the coats of the — eh! — you understand."

"Perfectly," said the Colonel: "I will state the fact. A large proportion of the electors of Mudbury, the town in the neighbourhood of which a good deal of my Wiltshire property lies, have been long anxious to show any little attention to me in their power. About a week or ten days ago, some sixty or seventy of them came over to my place, — a thing quite unexpected on my part, — in twenty or thirty carriages; and my man, who announced that they were actually arrived, was the very first person who told me anything at all about it. I immediately said, ‘Hawkins,’ — my man’s name is Hawkins, — I said, ‘sixty or seventy of them, — oh! — show them into one of the small drawing-rooms, and immediately have luncheon, or something of the kind, put down in the large dining-room.’ I thought that was not a bad precaution: that class of people have a high regard for their personal comforts, and as it is said, by way of national reflection, that Englishmen can finish nothing satisfactorily without a dinner, so I have observed, that they can begin nothing at all comfortably without a luncheon.”

“I see,” said Jack, “you are quite alive to the little imperfections of our noble countrymen.”

“Au fait,” said Magnus; “else why have I lived so long amongst them, contrary to my taste and inclination? N'importe, these fellows came, and I found that they were merely a deputation from a vast proportion of the electors of Mudbury, pressing me to come forward. Now, the fact is, my dear Batley, you know I have a certain position to maintain, and as far as any of the necessary labours, as I call them, of one's station are concerned, I am quite ready. As high sheriff, why, of course, with a certain degree of influence and property, and all that, in a county—it's a duty to—to—uphold the office properly, which is, in fact, unavoidable: but the House of Commons, the heat, and the smell, and the late hours which one must keep to be really useful, and the odd sort of hats the people wear—in fact, to me—I declare I could not, in justice, undertake the thing;—I love my ease too much."

"Ah!" said Jack smilingly and bowingly, "there it is: that is precisely the reason why things are going to ruin."

"No, Jack," said Magnus, "a vote's a vote, and I could give no more;—so, feeling that I and that I would consult some of those people best qualified to judge with regard to my choice ; but, just as I was stepping into my travelling carriage, it struck me that you, perhaps, were the best person in the world for the purpose ; I desired Mr. Wilkinson, my homme d'affaires, who is quite in my confidence, and who gets through a world of business in the shortest possible time, not to write to the Marquess of Pimlico till I had seen you upon the subject. In fact, I thought it would please you, and I knew it would please Mortimer."

The last observation puzzled Batley a good deal. It seemed quite clear, that if Mortimer had decidedly broken off all connexion with his family, his being either in or out of the House of Commons must be a matter of perfect indifference to him ; still, he liked the notion, and looked upon Magnus as a man very little inferior, in fact, to what he was in his own opinion. There was still a point to be touched upon and discussed, the settlement of which was yet wanting to confirm the exalted opinion which Jack had so suddenly formed of his friend. What that was, may be easily guessed : Was the return to be made free of expense ? — or was it expected by the magnificent Colonel that Jack was to secure the favourable opinions of the free and independent electors of Mudbury by any outlay of his own ?

Little did Jack, with all his penetration and knowledge of the world, think that the magnificent Colonel's only reason for not sitting himself for that ancient and highly respectable town was, the impossibility of getting elected upon his personal influence alone, and the equally disagreeable impossibility of raising, on his part, a sufficient sum of ready money for the purpose, without making some dreadful sacrifices.

“ With regard to the expense,” said the Colonel, “ it will be a mere flea-bitc—three thousand pounds will be the outside — so you must be quite sure that my disinclination does not arise from that cause ; and, in fact, having a good deal of East-India Stock, and West-Indian property, — all that sort of thing, — I ought to be in the House to look after my varied interests, independently of the stake I have in the country itself,—but — I cannot endure it: so, you see, my dear Batley, the offer of secession in your favour is, in point of fact, no compliment.”

“Why,” said Jack, his face considerably elongated, and his countenance expressing a mixture of surprise and disappointment — “I—I—that is — I — think — that no difficulty can arise upon that point.” (Hereupon his sanguine imagination darted rapidly towards his brother’s teeming coffers.) “I think that I can manage that” —

“Manage!” said Magnus interrupting him, —“of course. ’Gad, the idea of not managing three thousand pounds, I suppose, never entered the head of mortal man. I merely mentioned the sum, because, upon my life! the thing’s dog-cheap. In fact, these matters have become much more reasonable and more certain since we carried the Reform Bill.”

“True,” said Jack, — “anything better calculated for the advancement of bribery I never recollect, although I did vote for it.”

“Excepting always the ballot,” said Magnus. “Now, of course, with the number of tenants I have in different parts of the kingdom, it would be difficult and dangerous openly to tamper with them; but if the ballot could be really established, and for which, if you accept my offer, of course, you will do me the kindness to vote, the system is infinitely easier, — clearer, — plainer, and utterly beyond the reach of detection. Par exemple, if I say to any one of the three or four hundred of the people I have in Wiltshire, for instance, ‘I will give you ten pounds for your vote, or I will abate ten pounds of your rent’ — the case is flagrant; Thessiger, or Wrangham, or any of the leading Conservative parliamentary lawyers, (and, entre nous, Jack, the legal talent is all Tory,) — these fellows would knock us over; but with the ballot, where nobody knows anybody, and a bet does not consequently invalidate a vote, I say to Hawkins, or Jenkins, or Watson, or Jackson, or Taylor, or Tomkins, as the case may be, ‘Are you going to ballot?’ — ‘Yes,’ says Taylor, or Jenkins, or Watson, or Tomkins, 'I am.'—'Well,' don't you see?—with the vast spread of influence I have, I say—'I tell you what, Watson,' or Tomkins, or as the case may be, 'I'll bet you ten pounds the Tory candidate comes in.'—'Done!' says Watson, or Taylor, or Tomkins—and away he goes, and does his possible to keep the Tory out."

"A good notion," said Jack, "and I believe generally understood by our party; however, with respect to our immediate negociation, will you give me till to-morrow to think it over?"

"To be sure," interrupted Magnus, "the thing is an affair of not the slightest importance to me. I make you the offer, because, knowing your principles, I do not in the slightest degree compromise my own, and the fact is, that having a good deal of interest in other places, our dear friend Spoony—you know whom I mean—has been good enough to offer me a baronetcy, if,—don't you see?—not that I wish for it, or indeed would accept it,—it is now too common a reward,—so, entre nous, take your time and let me know at your leisure, whether my proposition is agreeable and likely to suit your purpose."

Batley bowed an acquiescence, and cast "a longing lingering look behind," "with his mind's-eye," on his brother and his fortune, but knowing how very thick the coat of that excellent pine-apple-like relation was, he almost despaired of being able to avail himself of the not too liberal offer of his friend the Colonel.

"Well, my dear Batley," said Magnus, "I have now opened my budget, — I think you ought to be in Parliament, — as I say, you don't care for the smell and the heat and all that: — to a man accustomed to perfect ease and well ventilated rooms, it is quite another thing, — my greatest care, by Jove! in all my houses, is about the ventilation; and, I declare to you, I find a vast difficulty, — my rooms are so large — small rooms, by the way, are worse, — so hot in summer, and so cold in winter, — that, upon my life, half my time is passed with those architect people and builders, who, in point of fact, know nothing about the matter, in trying to keep myself at a proper temperature. Don't put yourself out of the way about the offer; I dare say we shall either see or hear from Mortimer to-morrow, and then we can talk it over."

And so ended this dialogue, which, as I have already observed, completely mystified Jack Batley, who, although prepared for the mortification of being obliged to decline the seat, inasmuch as he shrewdly suspected that Jacob would have seen him safely lodged in one of the new-fangled parish Bastiles before he would either give or lend him the quantum sufficit for the seat, was, nevertheless, elevated to a great extent by the continued attentions and affections of such a man as Colonel Magnus, considering above all that he was the intimate personal friend of the much-desired Colonel Mortimer.

CHAPTER III.

THE ambition of Mr. John Batley having been fired by the offer of his friend the Colonel, he began to consider the more probable means of raising the sum required to conciliate the affections of his future free and independent constituents; and having revolved the matter in his mind in every shape and way, he at last came to the resolution of applying to Jacob, having worked himself into the hope, and even belief, that upon such an occasion his heart might be moved and his purse-strings opened. An invitation to dinner was the preliminary step, John having invariably found that his amiable relation was much more accessible after having made a hearty meal well washed down with generous wine, than at any other period of his existence.

These periodical fits of amiability were not peculiar to Jacob Batley ; it is upon record that a certain curmudgeonly money-lender would never turn a favourable ear to the applications of his thoughtless customers, until he was considerably more than half-tipsy. One of his most constant clients used to declare, that, when he first knew him, two glasses of port-wine produced the desired effect ; but that from the long habit of borrowing by the one, and of drinking by the other, before the witty spendthrift had concluded his connexion with him, two bottles at least were necessary to bring him to the lending state.

Jacob, who was a cunning trader, was perfectly conscious of the character of Jack's invitations, and looked for a financial application of some sort, as a sequel to the bidding, as naturally as he expected to hear thunder after seeing a flash of lightning ; nevertheless, he uniformly went, and, kind as he might appear, comparatively, towards the close of the evening, it was not once in twenty times the object of his solicitous host and brother was realized ; and when it was, as has been already hinted, it was because the refusal would have brought discredit upon his own name.

Other matters, however, arose in the course of the day, which were of deep interest to Jack. More important was the return of Colonel Mortimer to London, than his own return for Mudbury. Return, however, he did ; and the first house he went to after his arrival in town, was that of Mr. John Batley.

There is no doubt but that this event was considered by Jack, as indeed it proved eventually to be, the deciding move of Helen's life ; and it was with unaffected warmth and pleasure he welcomed the accomplished gentleman to his house.

"What did you think had become of me?" said Mortimer with an archness of expression which implied that he perfectly well knew, from the cautious style of the letter he had received from him, his real opinion of his abrupt departure.

"Why," said Batley, "to tell you the truth, I was apprehensive that some fighting business had called you so suddenly away, and I began to get nervous and fidgety."

"No," said Mortimer, "my fighting days are over; all I now look forward to is quiet, peace, and retirement. I am sick, dead sick of the vanities of the world, of its heartlessness, of its unprofitableness; and if I can find a really true, sincere, ingenuous creature, who will confide her destinies to me, and second my resolutions to become a good man, I am prepared to surrender my freedom into her hands."

The lyre of Calliope's son never sounded more melodiously in Pluto's ear than did these words on that of John Batley, Esq. Here was no equivocation as to the actual intentions and disposition of the gallant gay Lothario; and, although he affected still to be searching for such a partner in life as he depicted, still he would not have continued "harping upon my daughter," as Jack thought, unless she was in fact the object of his ambition and affection.

"I should think," said Mr. Batley, "that there is no young lady of common intelligence who would not be too happy to strengthen you in such admirable resolutions."

"Faith! I don't know," said the Colonel. "If I were poor and needy and found favour in the eyes of a woman who would make sacrifices for me and share my pittance whatever it might be, I should feel a confidence in her affection; but the worst of it is, I have been so perfectly a man of 'the world,' have seen so much evil, have done so much wrong myself, that I cannot conquer my doubts, suspicions, and apprehensions, nor make myself believe that I can be loved for myself alone."

"This is a diffidence," said Batley, "which"——

"No, no," interrupted Mortimer, "it has nothing to do with diffidence; it is mistrust. And since we are upon the subject, let me be candid at once—is Helen at home?"

"Yes," said Batley.

"Now, Batley," said the Colonel, "we are both men of the world,—we understand each other;—you are no more blind than I am,— you know what I feel towards your daughter, —yes, you do.”

“ I admit,” said Batley, “ that I think she is honoured by your favourable opinion.”

“ I have watched her,” said Mortimer, “ carefully and attentively. Her mind is pure and ingenuous—her manners frank and attractive; but—I will be candid with you—she was the sole cause of my abrupt departure from town; nor should I have returned for months had it not been for one line in your letter which announced the cessation of Ellesmere’s visits here.”

Batley, with a civil inclination of his head, listened to the Colonel, congratulating himself inwardly upon the eminent success of his diplomacy.

“ That line brought me back,” said the Colonel, “ because it not only imparted a welcome fact, but proved to me that you knew I considered Ellesmere a rival, and therefore used the bit of intelligence as a hint that the coast was clear.”

Batley remained listening, but not quite so well satisfied with the dexterity upon which masters in the art of finesse playing each other off, each fancying that he was out-manceuvring the other. Mortimer's propositions of reform and retirement were as much sneered at by Batley, as Batley's affected ignorance of Mortimer's feelings, and his anxious desire that the match should take place, were pooh-pooh'd by Mortimer; nor were Mortimer's opinions and views of the subject rendered less striking by the knowledge which he had gained upon his return to the hotel, touching the ardent anxiety expressed by Batley, with regard to the place of his destination, when he paid not only the house, but the stables, his precautionary visit of inquiry.

But a different scene was about to be enacted in the boudoir, where Helen and her friend Lady Bembridge were seated, the third person of the party being a certain Captain Stopper, against whom Mortimer entertained the most unconquerable antipathy, and for whom Helen felt not much greater admiration. Helen, however, whose eyes had been red with tears, and whose heart had been aching ever since quite as much as she intended he should, and at the moment when her bosom palpitated with delight at his return, she turned from him, after having permitted him to shake her hand, in order to ask Captain Stopper which of the new Murillo's he admired most, — the Captain being of that particular order of persons who are not able to distinguish the difference between a sign-board and a Sir Joshua.

“ I thought you were out of town, Colonel Mortimer,” said Helen, after having received a convenient “ I don't know which I like best,” from Captain Stopper, touching the pictures.

“ I have been, as you might have guessed by my not having presented myself at your door,” said Mortimer.

“ Well, my dear Helen,” said Lady Bembridge, who saw in a moment that a crisis was at hand, and felt, by the restrained tone of Helen's conversation, and the restlessness of her father's manner, that she was de trop, “ I'll run away. If a person have a great many commissions to execute for country cousins, of a horse after a man has bought him, is like advising a friend in the choice of a wife after he is married."

"Come then," said Jack, "never mind, — I sha'n't be offended if you abuse him."

"Shall you be at Lady Sandown's to-night?" said Stopper to Helen.

"Are you going?" said Helen, with apparent interest.

"Yes," said Stopper.

"Are you quite sure you mean to go?" said Helen.

"Positive."

"Come!" said Jack.

"I see I must consent to be the judge," said Stopper, who was actually dragged from the paradise of Miss Helen's sanctum by her impatient parent. "Adieu! — Good morning, Mortimer!"

And so they went their way, Jack having no horse to show, but perfectly satisfied that having once got his plague out of the house, he could finesse some excuse for not visiting the stables.

“ They were, Helen,” said Mortimer, “ and were the cause of my sudden flight from the scene of my unhappiness.”

“ Colonel Mortimer !” said Helen —

“ Yes, Helen, — yes !” sighed Mortimer. “ I went late ; the crowd was, as you know, immense, and I was lost in the general confusion ; but my eye rested where my heart was, and I saw that the envied place in the room was filled by Lord Ellesmere. I saw his earnestness of manner — his entire devotion to you. I saw you and Lady Bembridge leave the room before supper, and saw Ellesmere your companion in the departure. He did not return, and I felt the pang of knowing that his society was preferred by you to the general gaiety of the scene, — or even to the certainty of meeting me.”

“ But, Colonel Mortimer,” said Helen, “ how — why — or for what reason should you feel displeased with me for leaving a hot room when I was tired, or for accepting the arm of an intimate friend of my father’s ?”

“ Helen,” said Mortimer, “ the time is past

“Calm yourself, beloved girl,” said Mortimer: “speak not — I feel that I am blessed. Do not, for worlds, break the charm which is over me;—I am neither rejected nor despised!”

The look which Helen gave, confirmed his happiness; and before Batley returned from not looking at his horse, Colonel Mortimer and his future wife had calmed themselves into something like rationality; and when he arrived, his eyes were blessed with beholding the man whom of all others he desired for his son-in-law, sitting tête-à-tête with his darling Helen.

“Give me joy, Batley!” said Mortimer, “she consents!”

“I do give you joy,” said Jack, “and I give her joy too. Come here, Helen:—here she is, my friend; take her, and assure yourself that you possess a treasure.”

This appeared to “the world,” as well as it did to Mr. Batley, a brilliant match: and most brilliant, because it blended true love with wealth and station. Helen herself felt at once relieved of a weight of pain and anxiety, arising out of the various circumstances of her father's life. No longer was that cautious course of conduct which he was so perpetually inculcating required or called for. There was now no secret, no mystery; she loved Mortimer, and had owned it; she might now speak of him as she thought, and listen to his praises by others, without either deteriorating them, or denying his merits altogether: and yet it was a step of unusual importance to take.

Mortimer was her senior by nearly twenty years. His wild career had been run either before she was born, or while she was yet an infant: with the details and particulars of his moral offences she was unacquainted: she heard him generally set down as a roué; she had read in the peerage the record of his leading crime, but she attentively watched his conduct and listened to his conversation, without seeing or hearing anything confirmatory of what she considered the malicious hints thrown out about him. He was, however, himself sensitively alive to any allusion to his youthful follies, and most particularly so, if the slightest hint at them was thrown out in her presence. This sensitiveness rendered the society of Mr. Jacob Batley (who was certain every moment to make some remark that way tending) excessively disagreeable to him; and unfortunately, as has just been stated, the said Jacob had been invited to dine with the family that very day, — a circumstance which would most assuredly not have taken place, had Jack known that Mortimer would have dined with them also; or had he been aware of the character in which he was to appear for the first time in the family circle, and of the consequent probability of getting him to furnish means for the attainment of the much desired seat in parliament, without troubling his brother on that very interesting topic. As it was, and having constantly before his eyes the hope of eventually possessing the said brother's worldly wealth, and the consequent fear of offending him, he thought the best thing he could do would be, to ask Colonel Magnus to join the party, and desire Helen to try and get Lady Bembridge also, on her return from shopping, to stay and dine sans façon, hoping by this means to prevent as much as possible any dialogue between Jacob and Mortimer, and, by rendering the conversation more general, hindering the former from doing what he called "giving Master Mortimer a touch-up as to morality."

All these proposed arrangements were satisfactorily completed; Mortimer was separated at dinner from Jacob by Lady Bembridge and Colonel Magnus; and between the constant exercise of Jack's volubility on one hand, and the whispering conversation which was carried on by Helen and her avowed lover on the other, any collision between that "hero of many a tale" and his future connexion was prevented. But just as Helen and Lady Bembridge were on the point of leaving the dinner-room, the worthy citizen, leaning forward so as completely to command Mortimer's attention, said, apropos to nothing, and in the midst of a momentary lull —

"Pray, Colonel, how long have you been a widower?"

The question seemed to paralyze every one of the party ; and no reply being made to it, he continued—

“ I don’t ask for mere curiosity ;—in course it’s nothing to me ;—but my friend Haddock and I were talking over you and your affairs yesterday, and we differed as to your age ; and he said—

“ My dear Mr. Batley,” exclaimed Lady Bembridge, rising from her seat, “ the moment ages become the subject of conversation, ladies invariably run away.”

This dexterous movement was instantly taken advantage of by Helen, who also made a step towards the door.

“ Perhaps,” said Mortimer, who turned deadly pale with anger and confusion, “ perhaps, as mine appears to be the particular age about to be discussed, you will permit me to partake of your flight ;” saying which, and having received a gracious look from Helen, the offended Mortimer left the room and its inhabitants in company with the retreating beauties.

“ But, my dear brother,” said Jack, “ you are not aware, for I have had no opportunity of telling you, that Colonel Mortimer has proposed to Helen, and been accepted.”

“ Whew,” whistled Jacob, “ then she's settled ; — that accounts for his starting and staring when I asked about his widowhood. I don't care, that's one good thing : if he is angry, he must get pleased again.”

“ Yes, only,” said Jack hesitatingly, “ there are points in a man's life, to which it is not always agreeable to refer ; and ” —

“ Whose fault 's that ?” said Jacob : “ the man's own ; he shouldn't have done anything to be ashamed of ; — as for me, I never pity anybody ; — I have never done anything I care for talking about — that 's my comfort.”

“ Truly it may be so,” said Magnus, “ but Mortimer's case is a singular one : his youth at the time—he was in fact entrapped by an artful woman considerably his senior—in truth, a thousand circumstances of extenuation distinguish that affair from many others of a similar nature.”

opportunity of broaching the business to his brother, and sat upon thorns during the opening of the topic.

“No,” said he, “no : — that is to say, I have thought it over, but I have had no opportunity— of — that is ”——

“Oh !” said Magnus, giving a significant nod, “I understand. My reason for asking is, that I find time presses. With regard to my own tenants and immediate dependents, of course, the thing is safe, generally speaking ; but when one has three or four hundred tastes and fancies to consult, why, even if they are one’s tenants, it is difficult to ensure unanimity. As for myself, as I candidly said, I wouldn’t walk across my drawing-room to be returned : — my drawing-room ! — ’gad, no, — seven-and-thirty feet is a positive journey : — but I mean, that I wouldn’t stretch out my hand to secure their ‘sweet voices.’ ”

“What !” said Jacob, “are you talking of elections ? — umph ! A man of talent, and what I call up to the mark, might do a good have got your pension, and what you would say would go but for little: you might talk against time,—do the duty of a division bell:—stuff!”

“Well,” said Jack, “I certainly do not mean to press either my talents or claims upon your attention, but it would be, I admit, a great object with me to avail myself of my friend’s offer.”

“All I can say,” said the Colonel, “is, that it is as safe, secure, and snug as Sarum senior used to be”——

“Umph!” said Jacob. .

“Think of that,” said Jack, elated by the considering mood into which he saw Jacob had fallen.

“It might, to be sure,” said Jacob, “be a good thing, looking at it in one way.”

“All I can say,” said Jack, “is, that if you are disposed to assist me upon this occasion it shall be the last time I ever will mention the word money to you; and I am sure you my dear Magnus, will forgive me for talking private matters in this manner before you, the same time that you may serve as a witness to my declaration."

"Three thousand pounds!" said Jacob; —
"two years of the session over."

"Yes," said Magnus; "but, understand me, — I am prepared to guarantee" —

"Stop, Colonel, stop!" said Jacob; "this bargaining may get us into scrapes. I take care of Number One. Jack is my brother; but if I talk upon this matter, and if I may be inclined to go further into it, we must be alone: nothing like caution. Nobody would pity me if I was clapped-up in Newgate under the Speaker's warrant — hah! — well, thank God! nobody will ever try to make me wear such a wig as he does — no. Three thousand pounds isn't much for such a point: — but is it all certain?"

"All plain-sailing," said Magnus. "You know, amongst the people with whom I live, of course, a man is obliged to be cautious, as you say, and sure of his card. I might, perhaps, throw my influence into another scale, but I prefer a sort of independence. Connected as I am with so many interests, and with such a variety of duties to perform, I wish to maintain a perfect personal neutrality; and therefore, certainly not wishing to make such an offer to anybody politically opposed to my party, I prefer delegating my vote to somebody who, taking the same views as myself, can afford from all the various engagements of society, time, — and, I may add, health and constitution, — sufficient for an adequate and conscientious exercise of his duties.”

“ Three thousand pounds,” again repeated Jacob.

“ It is not so very large a sum !” said Jack “ and under the guarantee, as to the period of sitting ”——

“ No,” said Jacob, “ no.”

“ I see,” said his delighted brother, — see by the twinkle of your eye that you have the notion. Need I say, again and again, grateful I shall be.”

“ Grateful !” said Jacob, “ what d’ye mean by grateful ? — you will be grateful when get the money — for a week perhaps ; and then, once in the seat—psha !—there 's no such thing as gratitude in the world. Nobody ever was grateful to me ;—I suppose I never did anything to make anybody grateful. I'm sure I never was grateful to anybody ; I don't want to be grateful. I work my way ; what I get, I earn : I don't know what gratitude means."

"But," said the Colonel, "in this case, a fraternal feeling"—

"Fraternal fiddlestick !" said Jacob. "What difference does it make to me whether Jack is your brother or mine ?—we are all brothers. Why, if I had indulged in fraternal feeling towards him, I should have been in jail long before now ; and he knows that his anxiety about this very affair arises out of the question between a seat in the Commons or a room in the King's Bench."

"My dear Jacob !" said Jack.

"Ha, ha, ha !" said the Colonel.

"Laugh, my lads !" said the merchant :—

"many a true word is spoken in jest. No,— if the seat is certain for three thousand pounds, I think, with a guarantee such as you speak of, the thing isn't dear."

"Why," said Magnus, "you speak of it as a regular bargain — a kind of purchase and sale; now, that is by no means the case. My people are all perfectly independent, only there are certain contingencies which" —

"Well," interrupted Jacob, "I am ready to listen to all the contingencies and conditions, but not with a third person present: now that's flat. I trust nobody, and I will not get myself into a scrape."

"My dear Jacob," said Jack, "you are kindest of the kind; your prudence is perfectly praiseworthy. The invalidation of the whole thing, and personal difficulty to yourself, might result from the possibility of my being called upon hereafter as evidence to the transaction."

"That's what I say, Jack," said Jacob, finishing his bumper of port, and knocking the foot of the glass upon the table.

"Well, then," said Jack, giving the Colonel a signal with one of his eyes that matters were evidently going on well, "I will leave you two to talk the affair over. I tell you my feeling on the business—I know that of the Colonel; and whatever sacrifice you may be kind enough to make, in spite of your views of gratitude, I"—

"There," interrupted Jacob, "no speeches. I never believe a word a man says when he tries to flatter; it's all humbug!—no man means what he says. You go and look after the arrangements up-stairs; Colonel Magnus and I will discuss the other concern."

"Thank you, thank you, my dear brother!" said Jack. "Here, Magnus," (delivering the bell-rope into his custody,)—"ring for wine when you want it, and make yourselves comfortable."

This delegation to the Colonel was upon the principle already noticed, of mollifying the merchant by a progressive exhibition, as the doctors call it, of red port; and Jack, satisfied that between the ebriety of the dandy, and the inebriety of his respectable relative, he should in less than an hour be the member elect for Mudbury, proceeded up-stairs to join his darling daughter and her distinguished intended.

“ Well,” said Jacob, as soon as his brother was fairly out of the room, drawing his chair close to the Colonel, “ now, we are alone—’gad, I think, as I have said, that a good deal is to be done in the next session by a practical man who knows his ground. As to our Colonies and the trade, and the Slave Emancipation, and that—I deal rather largely in that line, and know a thing or two.”

“ Ay,” said the Colonel, “ you mean the Apprenticing question ?”

“ Yes,” said Jacob—“ that, you know, is, in my mind, all stuff—nonsense ! As I say, a black is a black ; and, as Lord Brougham writes, till you can make the black man white, why, you can’t give him a white man’s feelings—that’s my view. Well, they want to emancipate these blacks—talk of humanity—what does that mean?—why, don’t you see,—call the slave ‘ slave,’ or call him ‘ ’prentice,’ he’ll still be black ; and, as Brougham says, (I always stick to him,) ‘ if he isn’t whipped he won’t work.’ Well, now, they want to set these fellows free—good :—we say no ; but if they will, why, we ask twenty millions of money—a goodish lump out of a poor country—not to change the nature of the cretur—not to make him white—not to turn his wool into hair—not to stop flogging him,—but to call him a ‘ ’prentice’, and not to flog him unless his flogging is permitted by a sort of justice, who is to be paid for seeing how the flogging is done. Now, my idea is, that although this thing mayn’t be carried for three, or four, or five years, still, a man with a notion of what’s what, as I say—might make a hit in the House, and ” ——

“ — Benefit the cause of philanthropy,” said the Colonel.

“ Philanthropy !” said Jacob, “ fiddlestick philanthropy ; not a bit of it ;—do good to himself.”

“ Very probably,” said the Colonel ; “ but, my dear sir, do you think that Mr. Batley has considered the subject sufficiently—quite out of his line — to secure that advantage to himself or the cause?"

"Mr. Batley," said Jacob, filling his glass, "is up to every bit of it:—has all the Aldermanbury secrets at his command, and can show up the whole system, ay, to the very bottom."

"I had no idea that he" —

"He!" said Jacob, looking intently at the Colonel, "who d'ye mean by he? I never talk of he's or she's,—I am speaking of myself."

"Oh!" said Magnus, "but I understood that our worthy host was to be the person to represent Mudbury under your patronage."

"Patronage!" said Jacob, "I never patronize anybody, nor anything — why should I? Who ever patronized me? Nonsense! You tell us of an opening at the House of Commons: of what use would Jack be?—none. All he says is gabble gabble gabble — stuff! — very fine in diplomacy — bows, and smiles, and all that,—but no weight in Parliament. All his cherry-clappery rattle with a pension in his pouch, will go no way there, compared with what I may think fit to say upon subjects with which I am perfectly conversant, having a hundred and fifty thousand pounds in my pocket into the bargain."

"You, sir!" said the Colonel.

"I, sir!" said Jacob, "I speak for myself—whom else should I speak for? You tell me, as I have just said, that there is a seat in the House of Commons which you can command: well, I should like to sit in the House of Commons,—especially for a borough which returns only one member—have it all to myself—no partnership, no colleague, no bother, I, all alone. Well, you offer it to Jack,—of what use can it be to him? and if it is of use, what do I care? he never would put himself out of his way for me. We are alone—I know the world:—he wants me to give him three thousand pounds to put him again into parliament; I want to be in parliament myself: now, if that can be done, I'll make the three thousand, four; and that—pass the wine, Colonel—that will cover all contingencies."

Colonel Magnus stared with astonishment at his companion. He was prepared to admit all his failings and all his selfishness, still, the present exhibition far exceeded his most sanguine anticipations. But this selfishness, hateful as it appeared even to Magnus, came qualified through that "golden mean," which gives, like the less valuable tint of jealousy, a colour to everything it falls upon :—the words "make the three thousand four, to cover all contingencies," rang in the ears of the Colonel so loudly, as to drive out everything that had preceded them ; and all he said at the moment was —

"Then you would like to sit yourself?"

"To be sure," said Jacob, "who else? Why there are half a dozen whipper-snappering shopkeepers in parliament — paupers, — beggars, — who flourish about, and frank, and look fine, and do jobs. Why shouldn't I, who care for no man,—with a business better than the Bank itself,—why shouldn't I sit there too? If you choose, therefore, I'm your man, and four thousand the sum ;—only, no bother—no contest—no rotten eggs and poll-cats—understand that. Reform has done wonders —makes the

“ I will call on you at your counting-house,” said the Colonel.

“ Do,” said Jacob, “ that ’s business-like ; —but how are you to find out Lillypot Lane ? ”

“ Leave me alone,” said the Colonel ; “ I know London pretty well :—so, now, shall we go to the ladies ? ”

“ You may, Colonel,” said Jacob, “ but not I ; I think I am rather in disgrace with your friend Mortimer. I suppose the wound will heal—no matter whether it does or not :—however, I shan’t try to-night. Give me another glass of port, and I will toddle homewards, and if I am not too late, perhaps get one glass of hot punch and a cigar at ‘ The Horn.’ ”

“ The what ? ” said Magnus.

“ ‘ The Horn’ in Doctors’ Commons,” said Jacob.

“ A most ominous sign for that particular neighbourhood,” said Magnus.

“ And a capital place for a chop and a bottle of black-strap,” said Jacob. “ You fine gentlemen don’t know half the good places in this world.”

CHAPTER IV.

It was perhaps fortunate for the tranquillity of the Batley family, and even as regarded the final issue of Mortimer's connexion with it, that Uncle Jacob, wisely considering discretion the better part of valour, had effected his retreat from Grosvenor Street without exhibiting his comely person in the drawing-room. Certain it was, that the Colonel was bitterly offended by the question he had put at the dinner-table; indeed, he had taken an opportunity, soon after Mr. John Batley joined the ladies, of drawing him aside and complaining of his brother's abruptness and want of feeling.

“The circumstances,” said Mortimer, “connected with that marriage, and the death of my poor Amelia, are of a nature not to be alluded to without wringing my heart to its very core. Heaven knows that, if repentance and self-reproach can atone for vice and folly, my sufferings since her defection and subsequent death must have gone far to wash out the stain that fell upon my earlier life. A reference to it made by another, drives me almost mad; and when made in a tone such as that adopted by your brother, the feeling is still stronger:—do, pray, put him on his guard, and explain to him that the occurrences of my youthful days are interdicted subjects in my presence.”

“It is wonderful,” said Batley, “how totally impracticable he is. He has no intention to offend, but he has no feeling by which he can appreciate the feelings of other people, and I fear he is now too old to mend.”

“Only save me from the recurrence of such a thing,” said Mortimer; “and above all, beg him not to notice what occurred to-night in the way of explanation or apology, if he should express any wish that way; let it be forgotten—buried for ever.”

“I’ll manage him, rely upon it,” said Batley.

“Batley,” said the Colonel, after having looked at him earnestly for nearly half a minute, "do you think—do you believe—do you know—whether Helen is acquainted with any of the circumstances of that affair?"

Batley knew that she was to a certain extent aware of it, as indeed it seemed impossible she should not be, inasmuch as her curiosity (interest is perhaps a better word) naturally had led her to enquire whom Mortimer's former wife was; and moreover, as has been already insinuated, she, like many other young ladies in the world, was not unfrequently in the habit of consulting that important book of fate "The Peerage," and there, as we have already heard, she had seen recorded and registered the divorce of Lady Hillingdon, and her subsequent marriage to Mortimer: but Batley, who wished to prove Helen infinitely more innocent and ignorant touching that affair than Helen really was, expressed considerable doubt whether she knew anything at all about it.

A smile which curled upon Mortimer's lip sufficiently expressed his incredulity upon that point, as he said with impressive earnestness, "She ought to know the history — she ought not to marry such a man as I have been without a perfect knowledge of his early faults and follies."

This puzzled Batley: it seemed as if Mortimer himself felt that a girl of right feeling, delicacy of mind, and purity of heart, might feel a repugnance to unite herself with such a man. If this should be started, and if Helen should be frightened into refusing to complete her engagement to her now accepted lover upon that ground, everything would be lost, the match broken off, and Helen, in all probability, doomed to a continued state of single unblestness.

Batley, as was not unfrequently the case, was beaten by his own ingenuity; and all that Mortimer could extract from him was, a sort of equivocal kind of stammering of, "Why, I,—really, I,—upon my word, I," in which he dealt for about half a minute—time quite sufficient to assure the Colonel that Helen did know the whole history, and did not see in it any ground for objection.

“Come,” said Mortimer, “Helen does know the story — I hope she does — my heart will then be at rest : tell her it myself I cannot ; but if she is already informed of it, there ends one of my great difficulties,—for, Batley, bad as I may have been, I could not now find it in my heart to deceive or mislead such a girl as your daughter, even upon the most trifling point.”

“Why then,” said the sensitive parent, “I will honestly tell you that I believe she does know the leading facts of the case ; indeed, you may rely upon it, the very cause and origin of this conversation, my tough-skinned brother, would take care she should not die uninformed of them.”

“Heaven defend me from him !” said Mortimer, “though he is your brother. It seems quite extraordinary that Nature can form men of such opposite and varied characters and temperaments as we see every day in the world. Mr. Jacob Batley would discuss and descant for an hour, without flinching, upon a subject the slightest allusion to which would throw me into agonies.”

genuousness was quite overwhelming,—“ he would not have dined here to-day if I had anticipated the pleasure of your company, nor if I had not had an object to gain—a point to carry — very near my heart.”

“ And what may that be ? ” said Mortimer.

Now came the moment. Mortimer had made the expulsion of Jacob a sort of condition in the treaty of alliance between them : Jacob’s assistance to further the parliamentary scheme was therefore not to be gained by any more of that social hospitable conduct which his brother, as we have already seen, was in the habit of observing towards him whenever he happened to require his aid pecuniarily ; and, consequently, Mr. Batley jun. thought he might most reasonably and seasonably sound his intended son-in-law as to his disposition with regard to the three thousand pounds required by his friend Magnus for the seat. If, thought Jack, he hates my brother so much as to exile him from my house, he must be aware that I cannot expect him to assist me in the enterprize against the worthy people of Mudbury ; and, as money is no object with him, he will not hesitate to secure himself against the intrusion of a person whom he so much dislikes by an outlay of this sort, which, while it guarantees peace of mind to himself, gives him the additional gratification of serving and pleasing me.

“Why,” said Batley, having made up his mind and screwed his ‘courage to the sticking-place,’ “the fact is, I am anxious to be in Parliament again ; — and — I — perhaps you are aware that our friend Magnus has the power of meeting my wishes.”

“I know,” said Mortimer, “that Magnus, who is, as the phrase goes, ‘hard-up,’ is hawking about a Wiltshire borough, which he believes he can command, but I do not : besides, you don’t mean to pay for coming in, I presume?”

“Why,” said Batley, “I did think of it. Since the Reform Bill has passed, I see no other chance except standing a contest in one of the large boroughs, which I am not up to ; as for counties, they are out of the question for any of us : and so, you see, I naturally directed my views towards my brother Jacob. Now, as I know by experience that nothing but the soothing system is likely to succeed with him, I had begun a series of invitations in order to win him over ; and, in fact, the one which he accepted to-day has had some effect, for I got him to talk upon the subject with the Colonel this evening, and left them discussing it when I came up-stairs."

" I think," said Mortimer, " you could either lay out your money more wisely, or, perhaps more wisely still, not lay it out at all. All I can say is, if a seat in Parliament were an object with me, and I was sure of obtaining it by the process you propose to adopt, I should give it up in despair. — Come, let us join the ladies."

This cut-short did not quite please Batley, who found that, however generous, liberal, or noble a man's sentiments may be, the moment the word money is mentioned, he sinks to the common level of humanity. Jack congratulated himself that he had not gone the entire length of asking Mortimer's assistance, which, it was quite clear, he would not have afforded him; and with the elasticity of mind for which he was pre-eminent, he fell back upon Jacob-as his only hope.

Mortimer left his future father-in-law somewhat abruptly it must be confessed, and returned to the front drawing-room, where Helen and Lady Bembridge were still tête-à-tête; but his manner was subdued, the smile which had previously played so agreeably on his mouth had vanished, and a dense cloud of care seemed to hang on his brow. He had decided,—his course was chosen,—and the beaming, blushing Helen was his own:—but, could he see her without a recollection of the past?—could he forget those scenes and passages of his life of the details of which he devoutly hoped she was ignorant? No:—let the man of the world be ever so hardened; let him fancy himself callous to the appeals of feeling or conscience, his vaunted courage fails him when his looks rest upon confiding innocence like Helen's. He was wretched in the midst of his happiness, and gazed upon his treasure, as her father justly called her, with a feeling of doubt and distrust. "When she knows me, she will despise me," said to himself this wealthy, worldly man: his love for her, devoted as it was, was devoid of that freshness and singleness of heart which is so essential to earthly happiness. The besetting evil of his life was mistrust, not only in himself but others. He had himself triumphed over the confidence of a fond husband—he had been wooed and won by a fair and lovely creature, strange to say, not unlike Helen personally; and as he sat, abstracted and away from her, gazing on her bright eyes, her snow-white forehead, and her jetty curls,—curls blacker than the raven's plumage,—instead of contemplating the bright vision with satisfaction and delight, a deep-fetched sigh from his inmost heart was mingled with the thought that such had once been his loved,—his lost Amelia!

The associations which lead men to certain actions of their lives are unaccountable, their effects extraordinary, and sometimes absurd—pre-eminently absurd. In this case most true and certain is it, that the sym-bind my affections, draw me from this idle town and its associations, make me happy here, and," added he, with a sigh of mistrust, "hereafter."

All this, right and reasonable as it might be, was not what was to be expected from an ardent and devoted lover. Nor was Mortimer ardent, however devoted he might be; that was most certain. Helen saw that he was not entirely at ease,—not happy as she would have wished to see him; and of course, as perfectly unacquainted with what had recently passed between him and her father, as with that which was passing in his mind at the moment, she quitted Lady Bembridge, and, throwing down some absurd sort of work upon which she fancied she was employing herself, she crossed the room, and, seating herself beside him, said—

"Dear Francis, what is the matter?—you look ill,—you look melancholy,—nay, you look cross; rely upon it, frowns do not become you."

Mortimer smiled, and took her hand. It was the first time she had called him Francis;

it was the first time she had ventured to discuss the character of his countenance, or give an opinion as to what became it, or what did not. The smile was one of doubtful import,—the pressure of the hand was tremulous.

“ I will smile, Helen, if you wish it,” said Mortimer.

“ Not if you are not in a smiling humour,” said Helen ; “ I hate anything that is not natural,—as my thoughts are, so are my looks,—my face is, I am sure, the index of my mind,—I couldn’t smile if I were not pleased. And yet I have seen women in parties look as lively as I do now, while their hearts were breaking.”

“ Why really,” said Lady Bembridge, “ it must be confessed, if a woman have any domestic grief rankling in her bosom, it is a very difficult task to gild the countenance with a mirthful expression.”

“ And,” said Mortimer, “ what made you think the hearts of those laughing ladies were breaking, Helen ?”

“ Oh !” said Helen, “ because I knew their little private histories, and have seen all through their conduct ;—nay, I have heard husband in a crowded room speak as rude and nearly as loudly to his wife, as he would have done with the same disposition if she had been alone,—and I have seen the patient beauty, pale with fear at the violence of her lord and master, her cheek pale as a lily, and her lips blanched with fear, force an expression into her countenance, not only placid, but gay when spoken to by another unconscious person at the same moment. I have wondered as I watched, and loved her for hiding from the world the harshness of the man, whose humour, as a devoted wife, she would betray.”

“ Well then,” said Mortimer, half whimsically, “ if we ever do quarrel in public will, I hope, emulate the example you so extol.”

“ Quarrel !” said Helen, gazing on his countenance, “ what should we quarrel about ?”

“ I am sure I don’t know,” said Mortimer. “ I am only providing against the most pleasant contingencies.”

"No," said Helen, "let us go into the country,—let us leave this noisy town,—I am getting heartily tired of it:—I am, Francis,"—this last asseveration was caused by a sort of incredulous shake of Francis's head,— "all I ask is peace and quiet, and the society of those I love."

"I think," said Mortimer, "you will like Sadgrove,—it is a nice place. It wants the addition of a few more rooms, which we will give it, Helen. The Severn runs its silvery stream at the foot of the knoll on which the house stands; and I assure you, though not very extensive, the park is as prettily thrown about, and as richly wooded, as the best landscape gardener in the world could desire."

"I am sure I shall like it," said Helen:—
"you like it?"

"Yes," said Mortimer, "I used to delight in it."

"When were you there last, Francis?" said Helen.

"Last!" said Mortimer,—and his countenance resumed the gloomy expression which the conversation of the last few minutes had in a great measure dispelled, — “last ! — I haven’t been there much lately, — I, — that is — not for four or five years.”

“It is a delightful neighbourhood,” said Helen.

“A remarkably fine country,” said Mortimer.

“Aye !” said Helen, “but I mean a delightful neighbourhood for society. I have a cousin living not above twenty miles from Sadgrove, and he says nothing can be more sociable.”

Mortimer made no answer. When he lived at Sadgrove with Amelia, Sadgrove was a desert. This fact never occurred to him, when he looked forward to the solitude of Sadgrove as a most delightful passage of his future life, in which, like another Adam, he might enjoy his paradise with one sole companion :—the expression “delightful neighbourhood” used by Helen, brought to his ardent and sensitive mind an entirely new picture of his former retirement. Neighbours, — neighbourhood, — what did it mean ? When he lived there, the gates of Sadgrove Park rusted on their hinges, and the grass grew on the sills of the lodges; it was then indeed a retirement, and he still looked to it as one; nor till this moment had he anticipated any difficulty in reconciling a young creature, who possessed a desire for the pleasures of the country and the enjoyments of rural life, to a seclusion which is the lot of those who, by the gratification of some unholy passion, purchase a perpetuity of solitude, even in the midst of the multitude.

Helen's abstract notion of a country life (having been on visits with her vivacious parent to various country-houses) was, the transference of London into the country. A greater ease, and more perfect sociability, rendered her happier when away from the trammels of town society; but, of the enjoyments to which Mortimer looked forward, — the quiet stroll by moonlight; the tête-à-tête in which the husband was to read while the wife was to draw; or the morning during which the husband was to shoot and the wife to do what she could to amuse herself; the visits to cottages; the inquiries after sick old women; the superintendence of Infant Schools, and "all such," as the worthy Wadsford hath it, she had no idea. The windows of a drawing-room looking over the Vale of Llangollen or the rails of Grosvenor Square, were still the windows of a drawing-room; and a boudoir well muslined-up, whether it were blinded from the glare of Park Lane or sheltered from the bright sun beaming on the wide sea, was still a boudoir; and, therefore, Helen's idea of a charming country was, where she might do exactly as she did in London, only in a purer atmosphere for a certain part of the year: and it was for this reason that she was glad to get away from a routine of society of which towards the end of the season she grew tired, to that which, as she felt, she might in her new capacity choose for herself.

Old Flint, in "The Maid of Bath," when endeavouring to win the consent of Miss Linnett to their marriage, asks the young lady if she is fond of the country; to which she mere-pleasures are chiefly domestic, his home is as convenient as can be :—" You have good gardens," says the young lady, " no doubt ?"

" Gardens !" says the venerable lover, — " why, before the great parlour window there grows a couple of yews, as tall as a mast and as thick as a steeple ; and the boughs cast so delightful a shade that you can't see your hand in any part of the room ; and in them, there constantly roosts a curious couple of owls, which I won't suffer our folks to disturb, they make so rural a noise in the night. As for my mansion, you may stretch your legs without crossing the threshold : — why, we go up and down stairs in every room in the house. To be sure, it 's a little out of repair at present ; not that it rains in, where the casements are whole, at above five or six places at present."

" Your prospects are pleasing ?" says Miss Linnett. .

" From off the leads," replied Flint ; " for why, I have boarded up most of the windows to save paying the tax ; but, to my thinking, that which will be our bedchamber, miss, is the most pleasantest place in the house."

"Oh!" replied Miss Linnett, colouring like crimson, "you are too polite!"

"No, miss," said Flint, "it isn't for that,—but, you must know, there is a large bow-window facing the East, which does finely for drying of herbs: it is hung round with the hatchments of all the folks that have died in the family:—and then the pigeon-house is right over our heads, and we shall be waked at daybreaking with their billing and cooing, that will make it as fine as can be."

To these allurements Flint adds a list of the neighbours who are to enliven them when they require a little stimulus. "The Widow Kilderkin, who keeps the 'Adam and Eve' at the end of the town, quite an agreeable body,—indeed, the death of her husband has driven her to tipple a bit; Farmer Dobbins's daughters; and Dr. Surplice, the curate, and wife, a vast conversable woman if she wasn't altogether so deaf."

Now, although most assuredly no two animals of the same species could be so different in genus as Flint and the elegant Colonel Mortimer, the inducements which the graceful roué was holding out to Helen, as to Sadgrove, were, with all her professed love of rurality, not much more congenial with her taste than those which Foote's admirable miser suggested to the celebrated Maid of Bath.

Mortimer's thoughts had been driven into a new channel by the observations of Helen, and in a moment a new prospect opened to his view. This vaunted retirement of Sadgrove — what would it be?—in point of fact, no retirement at all. Sadgrove was no apt or fitting theatre whereupon to enact the drama of his reformed life: within a few miles of Worcester, one of the gayest and handsomest cities in the empire; in the midst of thickly-studded country houses, with Malvern at hand, and a thousand rural gaieties surrounding, his system of seclusion and reform was little likely to be carried into effect.

“What then?” thought he. “Helen has gone the round of London society for three or four seasons ; if she still retain her taste for the amusements incidental to a country life in our station, why should she not enjoy them ? To me the very difference of our position at Sadgrove to that in which I was placed by circumstances during my last residence there, will so far alter the character of the place, that the recollections which I so much dread will perhaps not haunt me. Helen is right ; we will be gay,—we will receive and entertain ; and whenever we get tired of visitors and wish to fall back upon our own resources, we can.” These anticipations first inspired by Helen’s artless observation cheered him, and his face resumed that expression the absence of which Helen had lamented to perceive.

It is not necessary, in the present stage of Mortimer’s association with Helen, to repeat at length or in detail the various conversations in which they indulged with regard to their future plans. Mortimer soon ascertained the extent of her admiration of the country ; and upon the principle which suggested itself on the first evening upon which she had expressed her sentiments and opinions that way tending, he resolved to make Sadgrove, in spite of its lugubrious name, everything that was lively and cheerful.

The time "progressed," as our Trans-Atlantic friends have it. The marriage of Mortimer and Miss Batley was the talk of the world; and paragraphs anticipatory of the splendour of the trousseau, and all other matters connected with so distinguished a union, filled the fashionable newspapers. Batley himself seemed to "ride on a whirlwind," and if he did not "direct the storm," anybody, to have seen him, sparkling and chattering in the highest possible spirits, would have imagined that he himself was on the eve of marrying an heiress with a fortune twice as large as that of his future son-in-law.

Meanwhile Jacob, excluded by command of Mortimer, and therefore decidedly affronted, pulled up haughtily, and declared that he never would set foot in Jack's house as long as he lived: and it unfortunately having occurred that his volatile brother was obliged to give him the hint to abstain, the very morning after his tête-à-tête with Colonel Magnus, Jacob, lest his return for Mudbury should be of use to that gentleman, wrote to cry "off" as to his negotiations for the seat, merely because Jack, in pressing upon him his own anxiety to sit, happened to repeat Mortimer's statement with regard to the state of the Colonel's affairs. Hence, in order not to relieve the embarrassments of any man who was a friend of Mortimer's, arose the relinquishment of his personal object; and hence, of course, resulted his positive refusal to advance one single farthing to advance the views of poor Jack.

It must be evident that the younger Batley, powerfully acted upon by Mortimer's expressed desire, that the bear should not come to his steak in Grosvenor Street, had sealed his own fate, and that of Helen's, as far as regarded the worthy of Lilypot Lane, by making him understand how very desirable just for the present his absence was. It is true that Jack softened down the harshness of the suggestion, by throwing out hints as to the love of retirement and quiet so much desired by two persons on the eve of marriage, and the embarrassment which they felt in the presence of strangers, the various matters they had to arrange and consult about, and concluded his qualifications of the “warn off,” by assuring him that the exclusion was not personal to him, but that there would be no visitors admitted until the wedding took place.

“You are quite right, Sir,” said Jacob;—“a brother is seldom considered a stranger,—but no matter,—the day will come,—mark my words,—when you, and the fine young lady whom you have taught to despise me, because you want her to marry a rake without principle or character, may be down on your marrowbones begging at my feet:—wait till that day comes, and then you will hear me say, ‘When you were gay and great, as you thought, and in prosperity and pride, you drove me from your door—it’s my turn now:’ and, mark you, brother, don’t call me hard-hearted if I do; for if the thing happens, do it I will.” And so went Jacob his way, his brother not quite unmoved at the last appeal: — nay, Jack, although neither awed nor acted upon by Jacob's threat in case of a contingency which as he felt confident never could occur, felt a pang at what had happened, and an anxiety to follow and appease him: “but it would be of no use,” said Jack, “it might only irritate him the more, and it were best to let him take his course.”

It might have been better not,—but that time will show.

Now it was that Jack's anxiety to secure Mudbury raged with double ardour;—Mortimer could not be applied to; the repulse he had already met with settled that question, and any recurrence to the subject would probably alarm the nice feelings of his proposed son-in-law. Was there no other channel through which he might obtain the means? This speculation engaged all his thoughts, and, as he felt, demanded all his energies. The vacancy would be declared in ten days, and that was but a limited period in which to make any arrangements: for, as Jacob had truly said, “ John Batley had been in the money market before,” and the advantageous marriage of his daughter seemed to him not unlikely to add to his facilities in again applying to his friends, who had, for considerations equivalent thereunto, previously afforded him that aid which his nearest relation had denied.

About this period in our history, the happy day was fixed for the celebration of the nuptials: every preparation was making to render Sadgrove worthy the presence of its future mistress; the settlements were drawn; and the fair Helen, with eight hundred pounds per annum as pin-money, and a jointure of two thousand five hundred a year, was accordingly congratulated by her elderly female friends, and proportionably envied by her young ones. Mortimer's kindness and attention were of the tenderest and most assiduous character: the bright prospect of his future happiness had driven away the gloomy reminiscences which, until his heart had been again engaged, and his thoughts devoted to a new and lovely object, had haunted and distracted his mind. He was an altered man ; the thought that he was loved, really and sincerely loved, raised him in his own estimation, and if happiness be attained in this lower world, Mortimer may be said to have been, at the present juncture, happy.

The state of nervousness in which Batley existed during this trying period, cannot be described ; his life was, as has already been stated, one continued flurry : but little was either he, or Colonel Magnus, prepared for the course which brother Jacob thought proper to pursue. Suffice it to say, that within about six days of the declaration of the vacancy at Mudbury, made by the appointment of the sitting member to an office with which the seat was untenable, Colonel Magnus informed Jack, that his blunt and impracticable brother had gone down to the borough, and was canvassing for himself. The name of the rich Batley worked wonders, and it became pretty evident to Magnus, by the letters which he received from his agent, that Jacob's straightforward principle of buying the votes for himself, instead of trusting to the gallant officer's agency, was likely in the most triumphant manner to take Mudbury out of his delicate hands.

The instant diplomatic John had, in all the confidence of fraternal affection, permitted Jacob to understand, that Magnus was in the first instance to buy, while in the second he was to sell, Jacob said to himself, — if that be the position of affairs, it is quite clear, tenants of the Colonel's or not, in his circumstances, I may as well outbid him in the market at first hand, as give him a premium for his agency. The Colonel wrote strong letters of remonstrance to his dear friends at Mudbury, and declared his intention of bringing down a gentleman of weight, consequence, and notoriety, to contest the borough against any other candidate who might be proposed. But the independent reformers knew their man: they knew that the Colonel's influence was what they called "moony," produced only by reflected light; that in point of fact, whatever his nominal extent of property in the neighbourhood might be, he had no solid claims upon them, and therefore, with long leases in their possession, they prudently resolved, in order to support the purity of election, to rebel against what might be supposed an undue influence, and pocket the cash of Jacob Batley, of whom they had previously known nothing, and had never before heard, in order to evince to the country at large that independence of their immediate superior, which is at once a characteristic of the party to which they adhered, and so brilliantly illustrative of that glorious march of intellect in which the British Empire so singularly rejoices.

CHAPTER V.

It becomes necessary for the better understanding of our history, that the reader should now be introduced to a personage of whom as yet no mention has been made, but whose character and conduct may perhaps deserve more of his commendation, than the attributes of certain others of the family party would be likely to command.

Mrs. Farnham was the sister of Colonel Mortimer; she had married young, and for love, but neither imprudently nor without the consent and approbation of her parents. Her husband was sufficiently wealthy to enjoy and afford her all the rational comforts of the world, without any of the dazzle and glare of society by which so many young and lively women are fascinated, but which had no charms for Emily Mortimer. Her career as a wife was as happy as she could wish it to be; but, in less than six years after her union with Mr. Farnham, she became a widow, and had never since the death of her husband returned to England. In the society of an early attached female friend, who like herself had lost an affectionate husband, she seemed resolved to pass the remainder of her days on the Continent; and although childless, the two daughters of her companion had so much engaged her affections, that, in point of fact, they appeared to constitute one family of love.

When Mortimer's affair with Lady Hillingdon became matter of public notoriety, his sister was absent from England; and, after the death of her husband, and that of the unfortunate partner of her brother's criminality, Mortimer paid his sister a visit. Then it was he earnestly entreated her to come to England with her friend and her children, and make Sadgrove a home not only for herself and them but for him: but Emily strenuously refused. She, although nearly and dearly connected with him, could not bring herself to make those allowances for his conduct, which his less sincere but more worldly friends were quite ready to concede; and his stay at Florence, where she was then residing, was not rendered sufficiently agreeable to him, to induce him much to protract it. He quitted her only to seek, in scenes less beneficial to his mind and morals, an oblivion which he sought in vain; and, when he returned to England worn out with hoping for ease and tranquillity, his eyes fell upon the beautiful Helen, and, as we have already seen, he devoted himself to the attainment of happiness by an union with youth and innocence.

It was now his great object to induce his sister to come to England to grace and sanction this second marriage with her presence and countenance; and he accordingly renewed his entreaties that she would accede to his wish and quit Naples, (whither she had removed,) and greet his lovely Helen as a sister.

“My dear Francis,” wrote Mrs. Farnham in answer to his repeated letters, “forgive me for still adhering to my determination to remain here until my excellent friend thinks it necessary to take her daughters finally to England. I find the climate agree with me—I delight in the purity and brightness of an Italian sky—you know how warmly I enter into all matters of art and virtù, and how ample the resources here are for the gratification of a taste which I could nowhere else so well afford to cultivate.

“If I could imagine that my being present at your marriage would either increase the chance of your future happiness, or give pleasure to your youthful bride, I would gladly make any sacrifice to do as you wish; but, really and truly, I have grown so unworldly, and, above all, know so little of English manners of the present day, that I think my society would rather gêne you and Mrs. Mortimer, (when she is Mrs. Mortimer,) than be agreeable: and as to my remaining with you permanently, I am convinced, by experience acquired from looking at the domestic circles of others, that there must be no divided power in a family, and that the intervention of a mother, or a sister, or an aunt, in the dominion which ought alone to belong to the wife as mistress of her house, is invariably destructive of domestic happiness. Your picture of the future is bright and delightful ;—God send the reality may be equally so. It has been for years the prayer and wish of my heart to see you reclaimed from irregularities which have been induced, I know, rather by a readiness to give in to the indiscretions of others, than by any inherent disposition of your own. The opportunity seems, by your own account, now to present itself, and I do fervently hope you will avail yourself of it, and become all I ever wished you to be.

“ Ten years’ difference in our ages, Francis, permits me to write gravely, and upon one point I write most earnestly. If Miss Batley be the person you represent her, leave her none of your earlier failings to find out,—be candid, explicit, and honest with her in painting the indiscretions of your youth. So may you expect candour and openness from her. Trust a woman by halves, and you make her doubtful, suspicious, restless, and jealous ; tell her all, and she becomes your friend, your confidential friend, whose faith no temptation will break.

“ If you should bend your steps hitherward, I shall, indeed, be delighted to greet you, and to prove to your wife how cordially I rejoice in calling her sister. Do not, therefore, imagine that my disinclination to do all you wish, arises from any cause but a dislike to returning to England at present. You are fond of Italy—why not come? You will move here as stars of the first magnitude; and I think we can make up a little agreeable society which will delight your Helen. I have no doubt we shall see you here before many months are over. Present my warmest congratulations and good wishes to her, and press my invitation with all your wonted eloquence.”

More, much more, did Mrs. Farnham write to her brother, which he read with his usual misgiving and distrust. “ No, no,” said he to himself, “ she has no objection to come to England—why should she have any? The objection she has to being present at my marriage arises from her sensitive delicacy, and the recollection of how I was situated when I last knelt before that altar. Her evasion is transparent; her motives and feelings are evident to me through the thin veil of pretences with which she tries to cover them. She foresees unhappiness in my marriage—at least, she doubts when she speaks of my future comfort, and hopes that my prospects may not be illusory. I am not good enough to be honoured with her countenance—well!—I could have wished it otherwise—but no matter—so be it.”

Mortimer, always alive to his own unworthiness, and conscious how obnoxious his character was to censure from those who knew his history, was seriously annoyed by Mrs. Farnham's letter; and such, with all his experience of the world and its ways, was his sensitiveness, that he was unable to rally for hours, sometimes for days, from the effect of any sudden shock to his feelings. He had made up his mind to having his sister present at his marriage; he had spoken of her coming to Helen with something like certainty, and had delayed the ceremony expressly for the purpose. He fancied that her refusal, couched even as it was in the kindest terms, would lower him in the esteem of his future wife, and stamp him as a man to be avoided even by his nearest relation on earth.

The disappointment to his hopes upon this, in point of fact, unimportant subject, preyed upon him so much as to produce a serious illness, not unfrequently the result of those dreadful struggles which it required to stem the violence of his temper; and when, after the lapse of five or six days, he was restored to the society of his betrothed, there hung about him a gloom which even Helen herself thought somewhat inappropriate to the season and to the event which was so near at hand.

While this dull period was passing, Mr. Jacob Batley was labouring in his agreeable task, not only of frustrating his brother's hopes as to Mudbury, but in that of undermining the interest of the gallant Colonel himself. Sharp, shrewd, and active, he had no sooner renounced all connexion with Colonel Magnus, whose name, like that of his friend, had been not unfrequently in the money market, than he proceeded to the London banking-house in correspondence with the Mudbury Bank; and, being on terms of intimacy with one of the partners, commenced a series of enquiries touching the real value of the Colonel's influence, and what sort of people he might expect to have to deal with. The result of which conversation was, a resolution to proceed direct to the scene of action, first sending down what is termed a good electioneering attorney, as his agent and councillor, to examine the ground; and, in order to make a favourable impression in advance as he called it, he paid a considerable sum into the London house on account of their provincial clients, without giving any reason to anybody for so doing: well convinced that the tacit lodgement of a thousand pounds more than he had proposed to "stump," as he called it, to the Colonel, would make a sensation in the place — where it was sure to be spoken of — not calculated to damage his interests when he announced himself, as he intended to do in a day or two afterwards, as a free and independent candidate come amongst them to rescue them from tyranny, oppression, and slavery.

To further this design, the lawyer whom he had engaged was one whose activity and sharpness were proverbial in the particular line of business for which Jacob had retained him; and, as in love, horse-dealing, and electioneering, it is held that "all is fair," Mr. Brimmer Brassey, of Barnard's Inn, was considered one of the most desirable acquisitions for a well-disposed active candidate in a contest that could be made.

Mr. John Batley's efforts to procure the means of facilitating his introduction to the "free and independent" vassals of Colonel Magnus were by no means successful, and the day drew near when it was absolutely necessary for him to give a definitive answer to the soi-disant patron. The reply, however, became infinitely less important to the Colonel, when his agent at Mudbury wrote him word that a gentleman of the name of Brassey was actively canvassing the electors for a candidate to be proposed whenever the vacancy should be declared, whose "appliances and means" were such as already to have prejudiced a decided majority of the electors in favour of the "great unknown."

However disagreeable this intelligence was to the Colonel, it was by no means a surprise ; the fact being, that the influence which he proposed to sell he must first have bought ; his personal weight in the borough ensuring him, under the provisions of the Reform Bill, nothing more than a priority of purchase. The sound straightforward sense of Jacob Batley hit this point in a moment, and before he had walked half-way down Davies Street with the Colonel, on his way from brother John's to Crockford's, on the night of the bargain, his sharp business-like mind had worked itself through the eloquent sophistry of Magnus, and by the time he reached "The Horn," where, as he anticipated, he took his punch and his cigar, he had come to the concluwhich were not in print ; told anecdotes of men and things which astonished the natives ; had a friend who benevolently lent money to anybody who wanted it, upon the least imaginable security ; and in fact was the most accommodating person in his peculiar line of the profession to which he did not do too much honour. At Mudbury, he was all in all ; the way he talked, — the way he sang, — the way he dressed, — the way he drank, — and the way he paid, — were the theme of universal admiration ; and, if the mere representative of the coming candidate did all this, what would the candidate himself do when he became the representative of them all ?

When Magnus read his agent's accounts of this unexpected invasion of an enemy, and the evident defection of his friends, who, as parliament may reform parliament but has no power over human nature, were humanly weak enough to prefer performances to pledges, and pence to promises, had, with a zeal and eagerness known scarcely in any other than a political pursuit, welcomed the stranger, and, as it appeared, painfully familiar to his ears through the communications of his now desponding emissaries at Mudbury.

To describe our volatile friend John Batley's feelings, when he heard the name of the probably successful candidate, would be difficult. Not only was he agitated and excited by finding Jacob thus positively and pointedly opposed to him, but because he felt perfectly assured, that this decided declaration of hostilities was occasioned by his having, at Mortimer's desire, "shut his doors" upon him. All the hopes of his life were exploded; and, in the present practical manifestation, he beheld the total annihilation of the expectancy upon the ulterior realization of which he had been for the last ten or twelve years living. Still Helen was settled—the great care of his life was off his shoulders; and, come what might, he should never want for anything so long as the Pension List lasted.

During the progress towards the completion of the contract between Helen and her wayward lover, for such he unquestionably was, she felt gradually and day by day less enthusiasm, and even less hope of perfect happiness with the man of her choice. Now that the doubts and difficulties incidental to a lover's life had subsided into a certainty of securing the object of his affections, it seemed to her as if he already treated her with a sort of authoritative superiority which, with her natural intellect and animated disposition, she was by no means likely to be satisfied with. There was no deference in his manner towards her ; while it was but too evident that he expected an agreement on her part in all his suggestions, and, in fact, something like implicit obedience to his dictations. Since his recovery from his illness, he seemed to have become watchful of her looks, and even of her smiles ; and betrayed a restlessness of manner, which she had never before observed, if she lingered for a moment behind in conversation with even the old chaperons to whom she had been so long entrusted. Nay, when Captain Stopper, with whom the reader may recollect Helen thought fit to act a little scene in the boudoir the day Mortimer returned, presuming, naturally enough, upon her extreme good-nature upon that occasion, and the interest she appeared to take in his proceedings for the evening, spoke to her at the door of Howell and James's, as she was quitting the shop, Mortimer hastily and suddenly withdrew her from the tête-à-tête, and exclaiming in no sweet tone "Come, Helen, we are keeping other people from getting up!" handed her, not too gently, into the carriage; having done which, he walked away, without too kindly taking his leave, till dinner-time.

"Dear Lady Bembridge," said Helen, "what is the matter with Francis?—surely something must have happened to put him out of temper. Perhaps his late indisposition has left some little irritability in his constitution. Did you see how cross he looked, and how harsh his manner to me was?"

"There are things," said Lady Bembridge, "which are never seen or felt except by the person who is particularly interested in the conduct and manner of the other person of two. It is quite impossible to form an opinion of the conduct of any existing being without being previously aware of his motives to action:—if indeed a young lady engaged to one man does think fit to bestow an encouraging smile upon another——”

“What other, Lady Bembridge?” said Helen.

“My dearest, I meant no personal allusion to anybody in the world,” said her ladyship; “I only meant generally to observe, that as lovers’ love cannot exist without a due proportion of jealousy, anything like marked civility to a remarkably good-looking captain in the Guards might perhaps induce the intended husband of the young lady, being, as it should happen, by a few years the senior of the captain, to ruffle the serenity of a temper not naturally too serene at the best of times.”

“Am I to understand,” said Helen, “that my speaking to that silliest of all simpletons Captain Stopper, merely to answer a commonplace question, is to put Colonel Mortimer out of humour?”

“Dear Helen,” said Lady Bembridge, “who mentioned those names? I was merely supposing a case by way of accounting for a strange brusquerie which might somehow be conjured up."

Helen felt herself colour deeply, and rejoiced rather that the rapid pace at which she and her companion were driven hindered her chaperon from fixing her penetrating eyes upon her countenance, the flush of which, she was conscious, was followed by a sort of shudder which she could not control. A world of thoughts rushed into her mind. It seemed that Mortimer felt it no longer necessary to gild over the weaknesses of his character, and that even before marriage he began to display a restlessness not very dissimilar from jealousy of his young intended wife. Helen gave her head a toss unconsciously, and said something to herself which it was quite as well nobody heard:—had the words reached Mortimer's ears, the chances are that their marriage, even near at hand as it was, would never have taken place.

Helen was, as Mortimer told her father he knew she was, noble-minded, generous-hearted, and good, — purely and integrally good: no one who could have read her inmost heart, and have reviewed her most secret thoughts, would have questioned or doubted it for a moment: but she was high-spirited, and when conscious that she was right, fully prepared to act upon that consciousness, and treat with indignation and contempt the slightest suspicion cast upon her truth and sincerity. As she herself has said, her great fault was her candour, — her want of caution in the use of words, — what she thought, she spoke: so that however much she might have prejudiced some people against her, by such a course of conduct, nobody could charge her with deception or dissimulation. That she accused herself of a want of decision in the case of Lord Ellesmere, and attributed to herself a mode of proceeding not altogether reconcilable with the principles upon which she had always acted, merely proved how quick she was to perceive her own failings, and how ready to acknowledge them when discovered. The truth is, and it may be summed up in a few words, — Helen might be led, but Helen was not to be driven : trust her, and she was fidelity itself ; suspect her, and her pride predominated over every other feeling.

On the day in question, the dinner in Grosvenor Street was not what the domestic dinners there generally were. Mortimer continued gloomy ; Helen remained reserved ; Batley was out of spirits about Mudbury ; Lady Bembridge was out of sorts about nothing ; and, notwithstanding all this, the wedding was fixed for the following Friday.

CHAPTER VI.

“THAT connexion of yours,” said Colonel Magnus to Mortimer, “has played the very deuce with me at Mudbury: I am completely undermined and blown up.”

“Connexion of mine!” said Mortimer; “do me the kindness to permit the fact, that he is the uncle of my future wife, and bears her present name, to die and be lost in oblivion.”

“Jack,” said Magnus, “he has contrived to make good his footing where I felt myself quite secure; and, as I am at this time advised, has reduced his return to a certainty.”

“Did you not,” said Mortimer, “reckon somewhat too securely upon your influence?”

“Influence!” said the Colonel—“you know the fact—you know how I stood: I had the electors in hand, but I could not come to their terms impromptu. It was, I confess, completely out of my calculation that this fellow should work his way into my labyrinth by dint of the clue I gave him myself, and actually supersede me on my own ground."

"Never mind," said Mortimer; "let him get into the House of Commons, or any other house, save mine; and the trifling mortification of being foiled at Mudbury will be admirably outbalanced by reading of his absurdities in Parliament, if his impudence should ever really be adequate to the making a speech."

"As for Mudbury," said Magnus, "of course to me, having so small a part of my property in its neighbourhood, I care nothing about losing it; in fact, it is hardly worth the trouble of keeping; but having actually come to an understanding with the 'free and independent electors' for fifteen pounds a head, (the Reform price of the Buckinghamshire borough I told you of,) and upon which tariff I had grounded the bargain, it is deucedly hard, after the fellow's having promised four thousand, which would just have put about twelve hundred pounds clear into my pocket, and have given me the éclat of patronage, to find him not only trading on his own bottom, but spoiling the market by giving the "great unwashed" nearly twice as much as they had consented to take from me. However, we will get up a petition if he is returned, and if we can prove a case or two against him, let him look out."

"Ah! Magnus," said Mortimer, "would I could interest myself in such matters. I almost regret that I hadn't turned politician, and endeavoured to employ my mind in some engrossing pursuit, — something that might have kept from my memory thoughts of other days."

"Frank," said the Colonel, "your mind should be stored with thoughts of other days, — not of days that are gone, but of those bright days that are to come. As for memory, take a sponge — out with all the records. Look forward, man! — you are about to marry one of the loveliest girls in London, and are, consequently, an object of universal envy."

"Envy!" said Mortimer, "do they envy

it is too late — that we had arranged not to go to Sadgrove immediately after marriage."

" 'Gad, I don't see why, Frank," said Magnus: " what can be more lovely, — bright, more verdant, or more gay? say it was of all places in the world adapted for the scene of a honey-moon."

" True," said Mortimer, " it is bright and green. All the charms combine to make it delightful — but I never lived there — died there! I dread to go with Helen for the first time since her death."

" Come, come," said Magnus, " get over this; recollect how intimately acquainted with all the facts of that false delicacy, for so I must call it."

when she becomes a widow, and the worthy gentleman is six feet under ground, begins to weep and wail and look back upon her past existence as something exquisitely delightful, and talks with enthusiastic veneration of the man whom, when alive, she quarrelled with every day of her existence, laughed at, ridiculed, and even"——

"Stop, stop," said Mortimer, "the cases are not parallel."

"They are so far parallel, Frank," said Magnus, "that no man on this earth could have behaved better or more honourably, more gallantly, more generously, than you did in that unfortunate affair of your comparative youth. It is quite true that Lady Hillingdon died at Sadgrove, but everybody must die somewhere, and"——

"My dear friend," said Mortimer again interrupting him, "I cannot, intimate as we have been for so many years, inspire you with one particle of my feeling upon such subjects. It is all useless to say why, or why not, I am affected by returning to Sadgrove; the sentiand subsist between men, approval of opposition of temper could not in the slightest degree with Mortimer on certain points with his iron nerves and impetuosity, went straightforwardly to whatever he undertook with a resolution undaunted by circumstances, and at no minor consideration could she perfectly at a loss to comprehend the selection of Lady Hillington, so intimate with Sadgrove, should, if he was dead and gone, at all interfere with enjoyment of new pleasures and there, the locale being quite as agreeable as it was during her life-time, and affording no change of circumstances, every p not an heir in the empire who would rejoice in the death of his parent. The whole of our nobility, our monarchs themselves, are only tenants for life; and, if this repugnance to occupy the castles and palaces of their departed predecessors were to affect their minds, we should have all the chateaux and mansions in the empire shut up or converted into Work-houses or County Hospitals. The highest dignities of the nation, like the foggy sovereignty of the City of London, are all transferable. My Lord Mayor Sniggs on the ninth of November steps into the state coach, out of which My Lord Mayor Figgs stepped on the eighth, and finds himself bowed to by all the same people, sword-bearer, mace-bearer, train-bearer, liveried lacqueys, "postilion and all," who four and twenty hours before kootooed to the then Lord Mayor;—the reign there is certainly short, but certain. In loftier circles the same things happen, and the same unconscious coach and horses, driven by the same coachman, and swarmed upon by hanging clusters of the same gilded footmen, draw through the thronged streets to-day, amidst the shouts and cheers of the people, the Monarch who succeeds to him that "died but yesterday," and who in one week finds himself precisely in the place of the one "just gone before," inhabiting the same rooms, attended by the same servants, eating off the same plate, drinking the well-stored wine from the same cellar, and hearing the same strains of music which so recently another loved to listen to; dispensing honours which erst flowed from other hands, and receiving the sweet adulation which so shortly previous had greeted other ears. If recollections like yours were to interfere with this——"

"Aye, aye," interrupted Mortimer again, "all that is different; succeeding to the estates and houses of one's ancestors is quite another affair; custom makes that nothing; no more than a man's sitting in his church under his father's monument, and over his grave, with the full conviction that, when the time comes, his bones are to moulder beneath the crimson cushion on which he slumbers out the sermon. Sadgrove is different. It was to Sadgrove Amelia first came to me from her home. Solitary as was our after-life, she was the star that brightened its gloom. Charles," said Mortimer, with a tremulous agitation which startled his friend, "she lies buried there,—how can I bear to visit it with Helen?—poor girl, poor girl!—with such feelings ought I to marry her?"

"This is a burst of passion," said Magnus, "for which I confess I was not altogether prepared, Frank. If your feelings are really so strong upon this point, if I were you, I should most certainly not go to Sadgrove;—why not go down to my place,—stay there,—I will put everything en train this very day."

"No," said Mortimer, "thanks, thanks! but no, I must live in my own house sooner or later, and I will make the plunge at once,—gaiety shall be my resource,—my plan of retirement, as I have before foreseen, must be relinquished, and I will endeavour to destroy all the recollections I dread, by making Sadgrove as unlike what it was in other days as possible."

repentance of his past faults with regrets for her who was the sharer of his doubts by which he was agitated and by which he was assailed, cast his eyes to the difficulties of Helen's position, difficulties of which she herself was conscious. To those who could have seen the real truth it must have been evident that his career as Mortimer's wife would have been no more than a struggle between certainty and the uncertain experiment of a man of the world, not only from the influence of external attractions but from the memory of his former life.

That Batley was altogether blind to the difficulties of the case is not to be wondered at. Batley had been much in the habit of looking on himself with Mortimer when Mortimer was young, and Batley was not older than life. Frank Mortimer at seven and twenty, and Jack Batley at seven and thirty, were, in common acceptation, contemporaries; and in their various associations, long before any idea existed, on the part of either, that a nearer tie would bind them, Jack had seen enough of the character, and knew enough of the opinions and sentiments of his friend, to have questioned, had such a thought come into his head, his qualifications as a quiet domestic husband.

It was after the period of Jack's greatest intimacy with him, that the affair with Lady Hillingdon occurred; a circumstance not particularly well calculated to increase an admiration for his morals, although, in point of fact, the view which his friend Colonel Magnus took of the case was that which was generally received. During the life of Lady Hillingdon Mortimer was out of the world; on her death he launched into all sorts of excesses on the Continent, until, palled with various devices to which he had recourse in order to dissipate his grief for her loss, he returned home thirst-he had enjoyed before, and created the confusion of his feelings, bordering upon misery in the happiness.

And in this mood he was to the beautiful Helen to the altar on Friday fortnight.

As to the change in his determination to his "manner of life" in it is but fair to state, that he was to think doubtingly of the seclusion the manner in which Helen had programme of their proceedings in with which, as the reader will remember a few evenings before favoured announcement of the alteration of received by the young lady in a way. When he talked of " her view, than because Mortimer himself seemed gayer than it had recently been his wont.

Looking at the state of society, abstractedly, all this reminds us very much of the story of the old gentleman and the young lady, which, on account of its prolixity, it is impossible to repeat. Its pleasures and amusements are but "the same thing over again," and nothing can be more unquestionably true than that, in a certain sphere of life, one party, one ball, one anything, is the alpha and omega of all; and what makes this monotony the more obvious is the fact that, since politics have asserted their influence over society, the nature of the amusement, whatever it may be, is not only unvaried, but the characters of the drama are unchanged. It is true that some, in the higher grade of political life, who having either retired from the arena, or grown wiser as they grew older, mingle, together, with their families, in the coteries of those ladies who, most honourably clinging to the politics of their husbands, maintain principles of a diametrically opposite character; but, generally speaking, during the season it is only the scene of gaiety which is changed, the actors are the same; and even if the performances happen to be occasionally enlivened by the introduction of three or four new personages, they are so little diversified by the accession as to exhibit no remarkable change upon the surface.

The anticipation, therefore, of mixing with an entirely new community—of being herself a brilliant novelty to a fresh crowd of admirers, was exciting, and, to use her own phrase, “charming.”

“That will be delightful,” said Helen, with all her native frankness; “tired to death of the same faces, night after night worried beyond endurance with the same nonsense, talked to by the same people, it will be ‘charming’ to get into a new sphere; and even if the change be not for the better in a worldly sense, it will be a change, and that is something.”

“The change,” said Mortimer, “will not be so marked as you seem to expect. Several of our neighbours in the country are friends of yours in town: it is true that there are some eight or ten families who seldom come to London, or mingle in its gaiety; but to those I am afraid you will not be disposed to devote your time and attention."

"Well, then, dear Francis," said Helen, "they will serve us to laugh at, at any rate."

"Why," said Mortimer, "not exactly that. They are people of rank, station, and consideration; looked up to and loved by their tenants and dependants; and, although their names do not figure frequently in those oracles of fashion, the 'Morning Post,' or the 'Court Journal,' they do not think so little of themselves as you seemed disposed to think of them."

"Oh!" said Helen, "if they are stiff, starchy people, that will soon wear off. Do these 'natives' come much to Sadgrove?"

"When they are invited," said Mortimer, looking rather confused, "by so kind a hostess as you will, I am certain, prove, they will, no doubt, be too happy to accept the invitation."

To this little complimentary speech Mortimer added, in an under tone, something which had no defined meaning, but which he muttered to himself for the purpose of mystifying the end of his answer, and getting rid of the subject ; Sadgrove, during his residence there, not having been a place to which, what Miss Helen Batley was pleased to call “stiff starchy people,” were particularly likely to go. To the infliction of such questions and remarks, the “gallant gay Lothario” felt he must make up his mind, and the only consolation which he permitted himself, under the circumstances, was, that they were proofs either of Helen’s innocence of the ways of the world, or ignorance of the worst points of his particular case.

“Oh, rely upon it,” said Helen, “I will do the honours entirely to your satisfaction ; and, as for popularity, you will see that we shall be the most popular people in the county.”

“It depends entirely on yourself, Helen,” said Mortimer ; “they are not in the habit of often seeing such a person as you are. All you have to guard against is a disposition to ridicule the peculiarities which, to a mind like yours, offer, I admit, some strong temptations.

However, I shall not point out their oddities, but leave you to discover them, trusting to your caution after you have enlightened yourself."

Whether Mortimer would have given Helen a catalogue raisonné of his country neighbours, or not, it is impossible to say; for their conversation was interrupted by the arrival of Mr. John Batley with the intelligence that the member for Mudbury was that day gazetted for the foreign appointment which vacated his seat, and that a new writ had been moved for in the House; and this information he gave Mortimer, still in the hopes of something like encouragement, even at the eleventh hour, to start, and make an effort upon Magnus's interest.

The Colonel had left town for his place near this independent borough, and, faute de mieux, resolved upon opposing Jacob Batley, himself; not with any hope of defeating him, but for the special purpose of running him to all the possible expense which a contest might involve. But, when he reached the scene of action, no Mr. Jacob Batley was there; he had quitted the field; but, nevertheless, the canvassings of the gallant Colonel were by no means successful; even they of the deputation who “Swarming like loaches,

Had made their approaches
In ten hackney-coaches,”

to solicit him to represent them in Parliament, bowed coldly, and kept aloof in a manner sufficiently marked to convince the Colonel that his fate was sealed. As soon as the writ was sent down to the sheriff, the walls in and about Mudbury were covered with placards announcing to the free and independent electors that a candidate of truly constitutional principles would offer himself on the day of nomination, and entreating them to make no promises.

These placards were imported from London by Mr. Brimmer Brassey himself, who arrived at “The Royal Oak” late in the evening, and forthwith summoned his friend the native attorney, and the select few who were aware of the course of proceedings, in order to organize the plan of attack. Colonel Magnus announced his intention of coming forward without fail ; and the inhabitants of the pure and patriotic borough were in raptures at the thought of the contest.

The Blues, however, secret as were their machinations, and cautious as their proceedings, could not baffle the activity of the Colonel's agent. It was clear that the majority was safe, bought at so much per head ; but, it was also clear, that Jacob Batley was not the man to represent the borough. Who the candidate would be, was still a profound mystery ; and all that could be extracted from Mr. Brimmer Brassey, when questioned either in joke or earnest as to whom the gentleman might be, was — “ You'll see — I say nothing — you'll find I'm right — rank, character, and money, — that's the thing gentlemen ; — next Tuesday will enlighten you all — till then — I don't let the cat out of the bag : ” — a bit of smartness, on the part of Mr. Brassey, which entailed upon the highly respectable individual who actually did come forward, the sobriquet of “ Tommy,” which he never lost ; it being applied to him by the electioneering wags of the place, as a suitable appellation for Mr. Brassey's cat which was not to be let out of the bag till the day of nomination.

The day of nomination did come, but with it no Mr. Jacob Batley. The Town Hall was thronged. Colonel Magnus made his appearance, and was loudly cheered, a circumstance which did not produce the slightest perceptible change in the expression of his fine countenance. Conscious that his friends had been bought, and certain of defeat, these manifestations of approbation sounded most discordantly; but, if he had been torn with burning pincers, or subjected to any other of the pious inflictions of the Holy Inquisition, not a muscle would have moved, not a cry would have escaped him.

The business of the day having been opened, a call for the candidates was raised, and Colonel Magnus stepped forward and addressed the assembled throng in a short speech, which was attentively heard, and loudly cheered at its conclusion: whereupon Mr. Stambury of Balls-were proposed, and Dr. Bulch of the High Street seconded, Colonel Magnus "as a fit and proper person to represent the independent borough of Mudbury."

When the equivocal noises which this announcement excited had in some degree subsided, Mr. Hogthorpe of Cackley rose and addressed the electors. Every period of his address was received with enthusiasm; every pause was filled up with cheering; and a tremendous shout of ecstasy rang through the Hall when, in conclusion, the honourable gentleman proposed Sir Christopher Hickathrift, Baronet, of Tippetton Lodge, as a candidate for their suffrages. This proposition being seconded, Sir Christopher, who had been sitting by the side of Mr. Brassey, rose up, and was, as the reader, after what he has heard, may naturally expect, saluted not only with loud cries of "Tom, Tom,"—"Puss, Puss," and such-like familiarities, but with some abominable imitations of the different noises in which cats in general delight, under the varied circumstances of their manifold lives.

although, as he confessed his ignorant of the cause of the vote with which he found himself , abbreviated his scarcely audible when, after he had finished and the candidates were proposed to the show of hands was declared ly in his favour.

Now came the Colonel's turn nimous : up he rose, and stated that his object in presenting himself and in permitting himself to be candidate for their suffrages, was the borough from being mis-represented by an individual whose name had been mentioned as intending to offer himself for notice that day. To avert that, we must not but consider a calamity to neither his health nor his pursuits were of a nature to render a seat in Parliament desirable. It was on their account, and with a deep regard for their interests, which he never could cease to feel, that he had come forward ; and he would have persevered to the last vote on the register in fighting their battle. — (Loud cheers.) As it was, the case was entirely different — (cheers and mewings) : — a most honourable and respectable gentleman of their own county had been proposed to them, — (more cheering and more mewing,) — and feeling assured that their interests could not be placed in better hands, he begged leave most respectfully to decline any further opposition to the honourable baronet's return, and to withdraw from the contest, begging, in retiring, to return his heartfelt acknowledgments to those gentlemen who had done him the honour to support him on the occasion.

After this came chaos, and after chaos the chairing of Sir Christopher Hickathrift, a ceremony which was rendered the more interesting by being performed during one of the heaviest storms of wind and rain that had been known in those parts for fifty years.

It is right that the reader should be informed how it came to pass that this triumph was decreed to lawyer Brassey's cat instead of Jacob Batley, although it is probable he guesseth at it already. Sir Christopher had long been looking wistfully at the seat, but a want of resolution on his part had left it out of his reach. The promptitude and liberality, as it was called, of Jacob, startled the waverers, and when Sir Christopher's man of business in Mudbury ascertained from Mr. Brimmer Brassey the real state of the case as far as his influence went, he next proceeded to find out whether the man who possessed that new and pure influence was particularly anxious to sit for the borough himself. Jacob certainly did wish to sit, but that was not his main object; it was to defeat others that he was labouring; and as the electors could by no possibility entertain any personal regard for Jacob, and as Jacob felt no personal regard for anybody on the face of the earth, a hint conveyed from Sir Christopher's attorney, through Brassey, that he might put four or five hundred pounds into his pocket by transferring his newly-bought friends to him, had its effect. Sir Christopher's lawyer and Brassey settled the arrangement, and Jacob, instead of being carried about the streets, and made to give a splendid entertainment at "The Royal Oak," in addition to all other charges and expenses thereunto incidental, gladly pocketed somewhere about four hundred and seventy pounds by the bargain, and on the day of the election dined alone at his favourite tavern, "The Horn," and finished his bottle of port previous to the imbibition of his accustomed glass of hot punch, chuckling with satisfaction at having defeated Mr. Mortimer's particular friend at a rate so extremely advantageous to himself.

On the Friday following this return, Grosvenor Street was enlivened by the appearance of various carriages at or about the door of the residence of John Batley, Esq., whence Francis Mortimer was to lead the blushing Helen to the altar in — it need not be mentioned — the church of St. George's, Hanover Square. The proceedings upon such occasions, being always very similar, have been too often described to need a line of explanation here: — the same tears, the same lace-veils, the same dejeuner, the same dressing for church and undressing for the journey, the same congratulations, the same elegant travelling carriage,—all, all over again for the ten thousandth time. On this important day, Mortimer received from the hands of his father-in-law the treasure which he had, amidst a thousand conflicting feelings, won, and from which was to be derived his future stock of earthly happiness. Some of his prevailing gloomy doubts and recollections flitted across his mind as he knelt before the clergyman who performed the ceremony, nor was the last occasion upon which he had plighted his faith to one who had broken her's, absent from his memory; but these were “ Too slight alloys for all those grand Felicities by marriage gained,

For nothing else has power to settle
The interests of Love perpetual :
An act and deed that makes one heart
Become another's counter-part,

And passes fines on Faith and Love
Iuroll'd and register'd above,
To seal the slippery knot of vows
Which nothing else but death can loose."

As far as Mortimer was concerned, the last line was not altogether applicable. However, married he was, and the party at the breakfast was gay and numerous: Mr. Jacob Batley was of course not one of it, at the which John Batley was much vexed, and Helen, who, repulsive as were her uncle's manners, could not forget their relationship, was greatly pained; but his exclusion was a condition of Mortimer's, and so, excluded he was. Colonel Magnus was, of course, a guest, and performed his part in the play with all becoming dignity: he spoke but little, but what he did say was emphatic and solemn.

When the travelling carriage was driven up to the door, Mortimer beckoned Magnus to the back drawing-room.

"Well," said he, "you haven't enquired where we are going; and as you only arrived last night, perhaps you won't guess."

“Going!” said the Colonel, “I conclude to Sadgrove.”

“No,” said Mortimer, “I found it would not do: I couldn’t bear it. We are going to Paris for a month or six weeks.”

“Then,” said Magnus, “I know exactly how that will end: you will go on to Florence or Naples, wherever your sister is, and not return for months.”

“On the contrary,” said Mortimer; “I am not in such good-humour with my sister, for refusing to come to me, as to think of going to her. If she had done as I entreated her, and come over to this country with her friend and her family, she would have been here now; she would have changed the whole character of Sadgrove; she and those whom she loves would have made a little domestic circle of our own, and with her principles and character she would have made an admirable companion for Helen, who, strange to say, is not quite spoiled by the world’s adulation, but who still requires a woman of strong mind and correct views to regulate her conduct. My sister Jane is that woman : — but no — she recoils from me — she despises me. I am unworthy of her ; of that she has succeeded in making me conscious : further I do not intrude upon her. In Paris we may get rid of all but present thoughts : there is much good English society there, and there we may with propriety emerge from the ridiculous solitude to which custom dooms a newly-married couple for a certain time in England. We shall make it out there till shooting begins, when Sadgrove will be bearable ; for the promise of plenty of birds will bring down plenty of friends, and we shall then, I trust, go on admirably.”

Magnus, who, as usual, heard unmoved all the details of his dear friend's intended proceedings, satisfied himself that the ceremony which had just taken place was not to be considered as unquestionably productive of happiness to the parties concerned. The necessity of creating an artificial gaiety which Mortimer evidently found, the absolute importance of stifling old recollections, in short, the struggle which he was making merely to try an experiment upon his own character and disposition, seemed to the immovable Colonel an affair replete with hazard ; for it was quite clear that, added to the grief which still preyed upon him, and the mistrust which he had of himself, he had certain misgivings with regard to the steadiness of Helen, and the desire that somebody dear to him should be near her to direct her course through life, was no trifling evidence of the real state of his apprehensions.

“ You have nothing to do,” said Mortimer, “ come over to us at Paris ; we shall probably make some excursions during our stay — let us make a little party — what do you say ? ”

“ I can say nothing,” said Magnus, “ for I am a creature of circumstances. I have a good deal of money locked up in those infernal Spanish bonds, and I do not like to leave them, for, with the game the brokers are playing in conjunction with the foreign news-writers, not to speak of the despatches written at Falmouth and forwarded to town by the Spanish packets, a man may be ruined before he knows where he is. But write to me — let me hear from you ;

and, upon my honour, if business permits, I will run over with the greatest possible pleasure."

Even in this last request Magnus saw another instance of Mortimer's anxiety not to be left, as lovers ordinarily wish to be, altogether alone with his bride, and of a restlessness which augured ill for the future. He, however, pressed Mortimer's hand warmly, and permitted his features to assume an expression of mingled solicitude and congratulation, but it relapsed into its former rigidity, when Mortimer, on leaving him, said, "Charles, you have been with me once before upon an occasion like this."

Magnus playfully pushed him forward towards the drawing-room, where the bridal party were waiting his return to witness the departure of the happy couple. That Helen looked beautiful nobody could deny; that she looked happy is another affair. The entire change of character effected by the ceremony which had so recently been performed, the entire alteration of the duties of life produced by that sacred rite, the vast futurity opening to her view, so different in its nature from the days that were passed; the entire surrender of herself to an authority which the day before she did not acknowledge, and the abandonment, to a certain extent, of that exclusive obedience which a few hours previously she implicitly yielded to her father; the whole combination of circumstances, the balance between perfect happiness and something less than happiness, the apprehension, the doubt, the dread, the joy, the sorrow,—for they all mingle in the heart of a bride at the moment when she hears the carriage-door close upon herself and her husband, and finds herself, for the first time in her life, confided to the care, the protection, and the love, of an alien to her blood, Helen deeply and intensely felt; and the pang which rent her heart as she received her fond father's parting kiss, the last of those kisses of devoted affection which were hers while she alone was all his care, and while she had none other to look to or love but him, was one of the bitterest she had ever endured. It seemed like the tearing asunder of a thousand tender ties, the

CHAPTER VII.

Few were the days that elapsed after Helen's wedding before Mr. John Batley presented himself at Jacob's counting-house in Lilypot Lane; but vain were his attempts to obtain admission upon his first application. The request to see him, on the part of his brother, was pressed upon him by a confidential clerk: "Well," groaned Jacob, "if it must be so, it must. I may, for all I know, commit an act of bankruptcy by denying myself, considering I never dine here: let him in then—not that I want to see him; and I don't suppose I should if he did not want something of me. Show him in."

"My dear Jacob," said Batley, as he entered the counting-house in a sort of theatrical pace, his lips smirking and his eyes twinkling, "I am delighted to"——

"That 'll do, sir,—that 'll do!" interrupted Jacob. "I know: the quality folks are gone, and now Jacob is suddenly becoming very delightful. If you have anything to say on business, be short; I have little time to lose upon talk."

"I merely came to say, my dear brother," said Jack, "that now I have cleared my house of the only man that ever objected to your society, I shall be too happy to see you again under my roof. What say you to to-day—only four of us—at a quarter past seven?"

"Psha!" said Jacob. "You know what Mr. Pitt said to the Duchess of Gordon when she asked him one day to come and dine with her at nine.—'Very sorry he couldn't, for he was engaged to sup with the Bishop of Lincoln at eight.'—Quarter past seven!—no: by that time I shall have dined, and had my port, my punch, and perhaps my pipe, ay, even before you think of sitting down. Why, d'ye suppose when I go to your fine banquets in Grosvenor Street that I haven't dined before I come? What do the women do?—I have caught them at it when I was let into your house:—they eat like aldermen at luncheon: don't care a button for an old fogey like me—no:—before me, at it they go; cutlet after cutlet; a little bit of this, and a little bit of that; and eh!—psha!—heavy luncheons make delicate dinners. I'm up to that! No, Jack,—if I am not good enough for your company, I am better left out altogether.”

“Nay,” said Jack, “but you should do me justice: I am always delighted, as you know, to see you; and whether you dine before you come, and make my dinner, like Mr. Pitt's, a supper, I care not. You must know, Jacob,”—looking at him with a marked expression of affection, “you must know that to me you are always welcome. Colonel Mortimer is a man of the world, but he is peculiarly circumstanced; he is nervous,—sensitive,—and”——

“Yes,” said Jacob; “that is to say, he has done a great heap of things of which he is naturally ashamed. He is all over irritability, and plain speaking won't do: it never does with that sort of man:—and yet, the sort of man who cannot hear plain truth without wincing, is the sort of man you have chosen for a son-in-law! I could tell you something more about him and his, but I sha'n't. It is nothing to me, and I don't want to get into any worry; but I know what I know,—and what I know, Master Johnny, I keep to myself.”

“Still,” said Jacob, “you will come and dine with me.”

“I won't now, and that's flat,” said Jacob. “You fancy your invitations are favours; they are worries. Why should I, living in Lilypot Lane, take the trouble to dress myself up with silk stockings and pumps, as they call them, to go pottering up to Grosvenor Street to eat, or rather look at, for I never eat, a parcel of what you call entries or entrays, or something—meat made nasty; dishes with poor honest turkeys smothered with dabs of pudding, and suffocated with chestnuts and cray-fish, which never were meant to be near them; salmon pelted with capers; or fowls bedeviled with lumps of nastiness —truffles you call them —lumps of fungus that dogs rout out of the ground under trees with their noses, and all that; tongues varnished like pictures; and a paw-about mess that you call pitchamele, or something, and all the rest of it? No, no: I am glad to see you, because I like you as well as I like anybody else; but all the green and yellow smish-smashery that you fancy fine, and get the gout by eating, I look upon with sovereign contempt. Give me a plain, clean, wholesome dinner at four o'clock, and no luncheon; — as to your fine feeds, keep them."

"Well," said Jack, "if you like plain cookery"——

"If!" exclaimed Jacob—"why, what cookery did you like when you were young? —you didn't care much about it then. Rely upon it, the best sauce for a dinner is a good appetite; but you have spoiled yours. I would bet you a guinea that I would make you eat more, if you would dine with me at 'The Horn,' at five say, — I'll give you an hour, five, — than you have eaten for a year, barring luncheon — provided always that you pay your share. I never give dinners at a tavern, and I never dine at home. — You see, Jack : every tub on its own bottom.”

“ I should be very glad,” said Batley, “ to dine with you anywhere, and upon any terms, but to-day, as I have already said, I have a few friends to dine with me.”

“ Friends, have you ?” said Jacob : “ small party, I take it. What was the man’s name that lived in the tub, and walked about with a lantern to look for a man ? If you lived in a tub, you might walk your legs off before you found a friend ; but as you occupy a house, and keep a table that you can’t afford, the smooth-faced hypocrites come at your call, and do you the honour to eat your victuals and drink your wine, and then go away and laugh at you. I suppose that tom-foolery is nearly now at an end ; having married Helen, I conclude you will get rid of your house.”

“ Why,” said Batley junior, “ that would look strange. The world would wonder ” —

“ There you go again,” exclaimed Jacob.
“ The world ! — why ”——

“ But,” said John Batley interrupting his brother, “ I have another object in view.”

“ Oh !” said Jacob in a tone expressive of the utmost indifference upon any subject connected with his gay relative, who, strange to say, with all his knowledge of the world, never despaired of interesting the merchant in his affairs, and rarely did anything without consulting him — “ and what may that be — more wild geese, or more wild oats ?”

“ Neither,” said John, “ but the fact is ”——

“ Ah !” said Jacob, “ that is what you generally begin with, before you bring out a bouncer. I know ‘ facts ’ are not always truths : but go on, because I have business of consequence to do, and ”—— “ I will be brief,” said Batley. “ The fact is, brother, that when a man has been used to a home and female society, he feels a loss when deprived of it, which nobody, dissimilarly situated, can properly appreciate. I lived happily with my poor dear wife, and at her death Helen was sufficiently grown up to be a companion to me, and to rally round me female friends. She is now gone. I anticipate nothing but misery and wretchedness in the life I am destined to lead, and having long foreseen this, have for some time resolved upon marrying again."

"Marry again!" said Jacob,— "well, that is something to talk about. I never married once."

"And therefore are insensible to the delights of a home cheered by the presence and influence of an amiable woman," said Jack.

"Psha!" replied Jacob. "You have contrived to do remarkably well for a long time without 'the presence and influence of an amiable woman:' what's the use of beginning again now?"

"Pardon me!" said John — "not exactly; while, as I have just said, Helen was with me, I felt that I had a home, — an agreeable home, where her presence ensured that sort of society in which, I admit, I rejoice; and now she is gone, it will be a blank."

"And yet," said Jacob, "you never were easy till she went."

"Can't you conceive it possible, my dear

“ I never had a child. However, to marry, you will marry, I supply yourself ; and as I can have nothing, I really don't want to hear anything. Here, Mr. Grub, bring me what I can't waste my time.”

“ And you won't come ?” said angrily.

“ Psha ! no,” replied Jacob shak and John took his leave, not at all with the tone of his brother's objection to his marriage, yet still hoping that his death should precede his own, and find in his will a striking proof of his virtuous conduct which he had never discovered while alive.

THE END

—and, as he truly said, the relative ages of himself and Helen had, in some degree, alleviated the grief which he felt for the loss of her mother, by placing her in the position of mistress of his house, at a somewhat premature age, perhaps,—but there she was,—and, as he vainly endeavoured to impress upon Jacob's mind,—there was female society; and John liked female society: he had been a sort of male coquette all his life, and loved dangling at fifty-four as much as he did when he was less than half that age; and it is astonishing (perhaps not, because the case is so common) that a habit of that sort does not wear off with time as might be expected. The man of fifty-four flirts, and is not ill received; but he does not appreciate the mode of his reception; he does not feel himself much older than he was, five-and-twenty years before; he scarcely sees an alteration in his own person; all that he wonders at is, the extraordinary flippancy and forwardness of boys of five-and-twenty, forgetting that when he was of their age he considered an old fellow of fifty-four a “regular nuisance.” not have believed, and certainly pated. Fifty years ago, the id sixty in a black neckcloth, w trousers, and a fancy waistcoat, studs in his shirt-bosom, danc never would have entered into human being. The dress might gay, or gayer, but it would ha up of pomatum and powder an club, with shorts, and shoes and one period, the pig-tail, which s club-knob which had previously the bag, would have been indispe there are at this moment half a s gentlemen, who thirty years since knobs, and pigs, with powder an aforesaid, walking the assemblies

would marry? and the question again resolved itself into another, what sort of woman would marry Batley? One of the cleverest of her sex said, that the most dangerous part of a man was his tongue; and no doubt what her ladyship said was true; for when the mind is won, the heart and everything else follow. To those who knew Batley best, it would, no doubt, have appeared most probable that he would have sought for noble blood; but when a man of Batley's standing takes that line, he must not expect to have it young. Lady Angelim, and Lady Seraphina are, no doubt, to be gotten hold of under such circumstances; but they must be poor and elderly; and it remained with Batley to decide, whether to flourish amidst "the sublime and beautiful" in Burke's Peerage, with a sort of negative reception in the family of the lady; were of sufficient importance to outweigh the attractions of a younger bride of less pretension. What he did in this momentous affair a little time and patience will show.

Finding all efforts to interest his brother in cy, a career of gaiety, by which he dispel the gloom of his desolate bring himself into notice in his new of a disposable widower.

The days and the weeks wore on honey-moon of Mortimer and his Helen was over, and yet no sympathy appeared of their return to Sadgrove tired of Paris, and the praise which vied on her beauty and accomplishments for change; but, whenever she touched home, Mortimer interposed some very strong reasons why they had better wait a little longer was repeated so often as to protract in Paris for nearly seven weeks, during period Mortimer received several letters from his sister, to which he duly returned

.

he seemed more gloomy than usual after receiving one of them—for he had relapsed into gloom very soon after his marriage; and although she did not like to make any enquiries about the correspondence, she still felt uneasy at perceiving what she considered a want of confidence in her, in the conduct of her husband.

This feeling induced her to write, as was her wont, a letter to her father, from which the reader may infer that the harmony of their union was not altogether so sweet as might have been expected. I am able to submit it.

“DEAR FATHER,

Paris.

“Your kind letter was most welcome, and I will take care of the commissions you speak of, although a little puzzled as to the person or persons for whom the gaities are designed. I speak sincerely to you when I tell you that I am tired to death of this Paris, one lives so constantly abroad, so constantly before the world. I don't know how the French themselves feel, but I do think there is nothing like home in Paris,—and Paris is France.

man being can be to another, as society beyond all description, but something worries him constantly.
give the world to go to Sadgrove nally proposed, but whenever I mention always interposes some objection pose is good, but which does not appear to me sufficient. He has been very kind deal to his sister, and seems very anxious me to be known to her; but, from the other ther, she declines the honour; why, I can actly imagine. Colonel Magnus, who has been staying with us for the last and, somehow, I begin to dislike him ever. He and Francis talk about which I am wholly ignorant, and and look grave by turns; and I believe with all my heart. I do not, because I must not, mean my own dear home with you, but I mean Sadgrove, which is my home now.

“ You cannot think, dear Pappy, how strange it seems to be treated with a sort of formality and restraint by one whom one loves. You always told me when you came home all that you had heard and seen. You expressed your wishes, imparted your thoughts, and all without reserve or constraint ; but Francis does not treat me so. If anybody speaks to me civilly, I mean any of these gay Parisian dandies for whom I care nothing, of course, but to whom one must in pure good breeding be commonly civil, he looks grave and almost angry ; and when I, seeing that, (for, as you know, I can see as quickly as my neighbours,) entreat him to take me to England and to his favourite place in Worcestershire, he knits his brows, and even—don’t be shocked, Pappy—swears, and then begins to talk of his sister, and her disinclination to visit it. Whatever the cause of this agitation may be, I am certain that Colonel Magnus knows what it is. I know, Colonel favourable character since he has here.

“ During our excursion to Tou visited some old friends of his, a Countess St. Alme; they returned here, and we have seen a good deal since. She is an Englishwoman, b actly to my taste, — handsome, and apt to do what you have sometime at least as much as you were in th scolding me, for doing, — I mean sayin things. I certainly do not pretend her in that sort of talent or in kno the world; whether I am grown fast whether, being married, I have becom I do not exactly know, but I cannot her; she seems, however, a great favo Francis. She has one son of whom I to Francis and urge his return to England; I am sure we should be much happier—at least, I know I should—there, than here. Francis has bought me some beautiful china, and some trinkets that will dazzle you; but what are trinkets if the heart is not at ease?

“Colonel Magnus brings accounts of your being particularly gay, and says that your little dinners are quite the rage. I am glad to hear of this, for although, dutiful as I am, I did not flatter myself that the loss of my society would be fatal to your happiness, still, we are such creatures of habit, that even so dull a companion as I must have been, may be missed. I even miss the flirting and barking of poor dear little Fan, and should jump for joy to hear her welcome me to Grosvenor Street—I hope she is well.

“I have written to-day to Lady Bembridge, but I have only heard from her once since we have been here. I wrote also to poor dear uncle Jacob, but not a word of answer. I wanted, if possible, to soothe his angry feelings towards Francis—as for Francis’s feelings towards

Jacob cares for, it is me, altho never experienced any farther ma fection than the negative advar being spoken to by him quite so everybody else.

“ Thank you very much for you of the 8th, and for the little bit of tained. I was telling Francis som sip, but he did not seem to like it I was setting forth the extraordin tion of poor Mrs. Z., he took me u rentally, I thought, and said ‘ Ho have our failings,—let us be sure perfect ourselves than our neighb we remark upon them,’—so I held like a good and dutiful girl, and for the future to avoid being snubbe

.

England, and with those whom I have so long known and loved, my greatest pleasure is hearing from them ; and so adieu, dear Pappy, and believe me truly and sincerely

“ Your affectionate child,

“ HELEN MORTIMER.”

Batley read this letter with mingled yet opposite feelings. The affection of the daughter which it displayed pleased and delighted him, but he was not quite satisfied with the tone which she assumed in the character of the wife. It was evident that the reserve which characterized the conduct of Mortimer had generated something like distrust on the part of Helen ; and it even appeared to Batley, from the total absence of any reference to his name as “ uniting in kind regards,” or joining in remembrances to his father-in-law, as if he had been in no degree a party to her writing. It was clear too that Helen was not so happy as she had expected to be ; and it was equally clear to Batley that he remembered some story of an old attachment of Mortimer, older than that of Lady Hillingdon, and of a subsequent marriage of the lady to a foreigner; and, if he had not himself been in full pursuit of his present matrimonial object, he would have taken instant steps to ascertain the precise facts of this nearly forgotten historiette; as it was, he had scarcely time to think over his daughter's letter, although its perusal left upon his mind a sort of nervousness and anxiety which qualified the whole of his day's occupation, and of the real cause of which he was himself scarcely conscious.

At this period of our history, in which some new mystifications begin to arise, it may not be altogether amiss to let the reader glance his eye over a letter, one of a series which Mortimer received at the period to which Helen referred in her's to her father. It may be considered, as the housekeeper in Morton's excellent comedy of "Speed the Plough" says, "vastly ungentle" to betray confidences, and above all, expose a lady's correspondence; but, considering that the recipient of the letters was her brother, and that we shall get more satisfactorily at facts than we could by any other means, we must waive ceremony and put upon record one of the missives with which the exemplary Mrs. Farnham favoured, or rather troubled, Colonel Francis Mortimer. An extract, however, will suffice.

“ I cannot,” says this exemplary lady, “ bring myself yet to believe what I am positively told is true. Francis, my brother, my beloved erring brother, you already anticipate what I am going to say ; let me be right in my anticipations of what you will answer. I hear that you and your young wife are living upon terms of the greatest intimacy with the Count and Countess St. Alme. I am sure this must be calumny, it can not be true—no, no, my dear Francis, until you admit the fact yourself I will not believe it. Truly, indeed, has it been said, that the world is prone to form its estimate of a man’s character from the early indiscretions of his youth ; and, thence dating, it is a difficult task to work upwards against the stream which runs fast against him ; but, forgive me as you know how I love you, a recurrence to what in youth were indiscretions renders the case hopeless. Francis, recollect old enough to remember all the anxieties of our poor father ; recollect that you, the child of both your parents, were the constant object of their care, the constant theme of their conversation to me. Recollect how much you confided in your only sister : let me not believe the history they tell me : — the Countess St. John, the associate of your young wife ! — no, Francis, no, — they libel you.

“ Your repeated invitations to England tell you, are useless ; I have already given my reasons. But do not yourself delay returning to your proper home, — take there your innocent bride, — be good, — be happy : — I entreat, implore you, do this ; and this I earnestly urge upon you, convinced that the charge I hear of this Countess is groundless. It should be true ! — but no, it cannot be : — I should, let me, with all the power I may have over you, press your instant removal from Paris. Surely, what you have already suffered, — the torture that you have endured, — misery you have experienced, — must of themselves act as incentives to such a step : — if not, Francis, let a sister's prayers, — prayers breathed to Heaven by one who, through a life now past its zenith, never has wilfully or willingly offended the sacred power to which she appeals, move your heart and fix your resolution. Go, my brother ! — do not expose yourself, and the young creature whom you have taught to love you, to trials which may, in their results, destroy her happiness, and for ever ruin your still redeemable character."

From this we gain something like an insight into matters of which poor Helen was evidently ignorant ; and yet she had seen enough in the boldness of the Countess, and the subserviency of the Count, to feel a decided distaste to the society of the favourite associates of her husband.

Mortimer's answer to his sister admitted the fact of a renewal of his acquaintance with the Countess, but denied either the impropriety or indelicacy of it. The Count and Countess St. Alme were a most amiable couple, univermarried an elderly gentleman of Blocksford, who, some eighteen had died, and left her with one was, as Helen had stated, his and naturally so, for, as she says he was “ a remarkably engaging

After leading an irreproachable widow for three or four years, she Count St. Alme, a smallish French with a particularly long red-tipped thin legs, by whom she had in the her marriage a daughter. The somewhat prematurely, died, and period the Count and Countess farther increase to their family.

That, as Helen saw, the Count and laughed, and even flirted, no
— and what the harm?

and even forwardness of manner, of which she admits herself, in her letter to her father, to be conscious ; still people only said, "What a lively creature !" — "What an odd creature !" — "What a pleasant creature !" — "What extraordinary things she does say !" — for upon a principle not unfrequently recognized, that a free tongue is the safety-valve for exuberant spirits, and that the "silent stream runs deepest," voluble volatile ladies of this school generally escape the graver imputations which those who, as Horace Walpole says,

"Know the country well,"

are apt to cast upon the quieter and more calculating of their own sex.

Something, however, it was too clear, had occurred (what, nobody can surmise) in Mortimer's youthful days, which rendered the renewal of his intimacy with the Countess St. Alme extremely objectionable in the eyes of the exemplary Mrs. Farnham ; and the circumstance coming to her knowledge just as she had admitted to her friend and associate at Naples that her heart was beginning to melt, and that she really thought she might be induced to visit Sadgrove, put an end to all further hopes, or even negotiations, upon that particular point.

We have already seen, and the reader has already perhaps appreciated, the difficulty which Mortimer felt in revisiting the former scene of his equivocal happiness and certain misery. It must be clear—at least if Mrs. Farnham be supposed to know the truth,—as regarded the Count and his lady, that the attraction, which even Helen saw the latter possessed for her husband, acted still more powerfully as a repellent from Sadgrove; but perhaps even the reader is not prepared to hear, that failing in his sister, and greatly disturbed by her lecture, the St. Almes were invited to supply her place, and to form three of the family circle at his paternal home.

“I have been endeavouring to persuade the Count and Countess,” said Mortimer, with a carelessness of manner well calculated to disguise the deep interest he took in Helen’s reply, "to go over and pass a month or six weeks with us at Sadgrove."

"Then you are really going to England, Francis," said Helen, exactly as he anticipated.

"Of course, love," said Mortimer: "where should a man live but in his own house?"

"No," said Helen, — "there we perfectly agree; only by prolonging your stay here, you give no practical proof of your disposition to go."

"I hoped," said Mortimer, "that my sister would have come to us and gone with us, but she throws me over; and I really think — you know, dear Helen, a country-house, quite alone, is not delightful."

Is it not extraordinary that Sadgrove, and the solitude imposed upon him during his residence there by circumstances, were so strongly fixed in his mind, that he could not imagine the possibility of rallying round him and his charming wife all that he chose of society? He dreaded the recollection of what it had been; and in order to render himself secure from a repetition of what had happened there, endeavoured to secure, by way of enliveners, two persons who, if what Mrs. Farnham implied was true, would not have objected to make it agreeable even under the former regime.

“Not quite alone,” said Helen. “But why should we be quite alone?—there are whole crowds of people who would be too happy to come to us.”

“I see,” said Mortimer, “you dislike the St. Almes.”

“Not I, indeed, dear Francis,” said Helen, —(which, having glanced over her confidential letters, we happen to know was not entirely truth.)—“I think he is rather dull and prosy, —and odd, —and queer; but” —

“And the Countess?” said Mortimer — “is she too lively? —are her bon-mots too frequent?—does she startle you by her repartees? I should think not, Helen; for having yourself been, like Britannia in Thomson’s song—

‘The dread and envy of them all,’—

I mean of all the beaux, belles, and blues of London, for two or three seasons, you must understand the play of such artillery, and know that the brightest wit is not incompatible with the purest heart."

Helen paused, and felt herself colouring up; her pure heart did beat:—Mortimer had shot his bolt beyond the mark. Who had even insinuated that the heart of the Countess St. Alme was not pure? Who had complained of the gaiety of her conversation? Why did Mortimer recur to the manners and conduct of his wife, by which he had been captivated?—or why lay a peculiarly strong emphasis on the words "two or three seasons?"

"I am sure," said Helen,

"With a smile that was half a tear,"

"anybody, dear Francis, that you like, I like."

"No, Helen," said Mortimer, "I really do not require any such implicit obedience as that; I never could myself afford it. You love your uncle Jacob—I hate him; and however much I love you, I never could bring myself to endure him. What I meant, dear girl, was, to consult you whether it would be agreeable to you to have the St. Almes with us for a few weeks."

“ Oh ! quite agreeable,” said Helen, — “ quite.” And she was again near bursting into tears.

“ Well then,” said Mortimer, “ I will ask them,—or at least you shall—it will look better: and, to tell you the truth, I think,—and indeed that was one of my motives for speaking to you about it,—I think the Countess fancies you do not like her; so an invitation this evening, in one of your most winning ways, will convince her to the contrary, and we will start for England in two or three days.”

Poor Helen was now completely trapped. She saw by Mortimer's manner that he had made up his mind that these odious people should accompany them to England, and remain on a visit with them. She felt such an awe,—not of Francis, but of the Countess,—that she dared not venture even to remonstrate against the proceeding, although she was aware that, for a certain time at least, it would be fatal to her own comfort:—besides, taking it upon other grounds, the admission made by Mortimer, that the enjoyment of his young wife's society, without some other adjuncts, would not ensure his happiness, was by no means either gratifying or consolatory.

Nobody can duly appreciate the state of Helen's feelings during the interval between the conversation with her husband and dinner-time. Her whole mind was occupied with the duty she was forced to perform, when she and the Countess should be left alone ; for Mortimer and Magnus had drilled the Count into the social but extremely ungallant English custom of "sitting and sipping" a little wine, after the ladies, according to the manner of the house, had retired. At dinner she was pale and flushed by turns : she reflected upon all the plans and schemes she had suggested for the employment of her time at Sadgrove ; and perhaps (for as to any sinister motives on the part of Mortimer, even if there had been any just cause to doubt him, she never suspected them) — perhaps she did not feel altogether pleased with the idea of taking possession of her little sovereignty associated with a lady, whose maturer age gave a greater confidence in her

...reason of two, — as one of the n
London beauties.

The task was to be performed, tirely did Mortimer rely upon Hele obedience to his wishes on the su he communicated to the Count, sh the ladies went, the fact that Mrs was most anxious that he and th should accompany them to Englan therefore, was it, — or unlucky, a may be, — that Helen did as she wa dressing her fine face in smiles th made her request to her vivacious vi however pleased she might be with tation, did certainly not appear so prised as a lady might naturally be to be at an impromptu of that s Countess said, — That she should he to see a little English society. "Oh, you are so good, Mrs. Mortimer!"

The Count had not been in the salon five minutes before the announcement was made to him,—his permission asked, and granted; and so much having been achieved, Helen resolved to settle herself into a course of beginning to like the Countess, to see the bright side of her character, to endeavour to appreciate her oddity, and laugh at her liveliness. But Helen, who was as quicksighted as her neighbours, felt a sort of check when her eye glanced over the persons of Mortimer and Colonel Magnus, who were standing in a window sipping their coffee, and evidently talking over the arrangement; and she saw upon both their countenances an expression which conveyed to her mind that in some way, or for some reason which she could not exactly define, they were enjoying the triumph Mortimer had obtained over her wishes and feelings, and that in the features of the Colonel there was depicted a kind of exultation at having made the suggestion himself.

patched to have Sadgrove prepare reception of its master and mistress visitations were forwarded to several friends of both to join the circle every sort of gaiety that could be the purpose of welcoming the party be displayed: in fact, all the doubts lays which previously served to cloud of Mortimer seemed to have vanished less than ten days the Mortimer
the St. Almes, Master Francis Blox all, were on their way to the “ Fairest Isle!—all isles excelling

CHAPTER VIII.

THE arrival of Mortimer and his bride at Sadgrove was celebrated by a kind of fête, prepared, to be sure, under his own directions, and paid for out of his own pocket; but it had, or was intended to have, the effect of a spontaneous ebullition of popular feeling, with which Helen was to be gratified and flattered, — flattered, as far as her share of the attention went, — and gratified by seeing how much her husband was esteemed by his tenants and neighbours: — and there were sheep roasted, and barrels of ale broached; and there were music and dancing, and flowers and fire-works, and every available display of rural festivity.

The poor neighbours did, in truth, rejoice; not, perhaps, that Mortimer had returned, — for he had lived, during his former residence up of the "great house" of a small ways a misfortune to the humbler one of whom was heard to say upon some occasion, "It does my head ache to see the great kitchen-chimney smoke."

These and other "external" means of gaiety might perhaps have been consolatory to Mortimer, but it was evident, that after two or three, or four, or four or five days had elapsed he did not find the drive from the house ploughed up by carriage began to feel the restless anxiety which usually characterises a man of distinction. The clergyman of the parish called without his wife and daughter, the attorney had tittered up on his burys of Littleworth, came not ; and these people, although to be found nowhere but in their native county, and in Burke's "History of the Commoners," were something : in fact, they combined in themselves the principal landed interest of that part of the country, and were, moreover, the "stiff, starchy" people of whom Helen had such a constitutional horror. Bores they would unquestionably have been had they come, but to Mortimer their not coming was infinitely more painful than their society. Deeply imbued, as they were, with the primitive simplicity of their rural ancestors, they did not consider the gaiety and innocence of Helen adequate to the purification of the atmosphere of Sadgrove, nor think the libertinism of Mortimer sufficiently qualified by the change in his condition which had taken place before his return to the scene of his former indiscretions.

This was a serious blow to Mortimer. For the Muffledups, the Stiffgigs, the Peepsburys, and all the rest of their tribes, he entertained the most sovereign contempt, but therefore did he the more deeply feel the disinclination which they evinced from his acquaintance — not as far as himself was concerned, but because the manifestation of such a sentiment might produce an effect upon Helen likely to degrade him in her estimation.

This marked inattention, to call it by no more positive name, could not long escape the notice of Helen ; but short as had been the period during which she had been Mortimer's wife, there was something in his look and manner which, to a being all quickness and perception, checked her from making any enquiries into the cause of the absence of the promised visitors.

Mortimer absented himself from church on the first Sunday after their arrival at Sadgrove : there might have been more reasons than one for this omission of duty. The associations of circumstances connected with the dead might have kept him aloof from a trial which would probably have proved too strong for even his firmness ; while the circumstances of his non-association with the living might have induced him not to provoke any exhibition of a positive refusal of intercourse with him or his family. Helen regretted his absence; but when she and the Countess St. Alme returned, she remarked to her husband that he was not singular in his determination of not going, for that there was scarcely anybody in the church except the humbler parishioners and neighbours — two of the non-juring families having pews therein.

“ Magnus,” said Mortimer to his Fidus Achates, “ I am by no means pleased with my reception in the home of my ancestors: something tells me that I am not welcomed as I ought to be here.”

“ My dear fellow,” said Magnus, “ rely upon it, it is the reputation of your lovely wife that keeps these timid rustics away—they are afraid of her: her sarcastic turn is known, and as you have yourself told me of your fears that she might scare a whole herd of them by one observation, so they, depend upon what I say, are terrified lest she should annihilate them:— nobody likes to be laughed at.”

“ Nay,” said Mortimer, “ but, after all, that word as implying fashionable easy, — but they are only correct eminently respectable :—no ; the they are of my sister's school of poor Helen will suffer for my gressions."

" She seems," said Magnus, " come the disinclination from the Alme which you suspected her to the outset of their acquaintance."

" So I perceive," said Mortim begin to be as desirous that th should stop where it is, as I bef it should exist. The Countess is earliest acquaintances ; and altho solemnly assure you that my sister suspicions about any closer co groundless. I own that I was glad and have made her an inmate here, especially at starting: the daylight rouge, to say nothing of the arched brows not altogether Nature's own, are not calculated to melt the ice of Helen's 'stiff, starchy' people; and, if I had reflected, I should have anticipated the disadvantages of such an association. However, it is done, and by way of truism, Charles, 'What is done cannot be undone:' the course now to pursue is, to render the circumstances less remarkable by filling the house with London friends; amongst a crowd of tigers, my vivacious hyæna will not shine out so remarkably."

The reader will perceive by this bit of confidential conversation between Magnus and Mortimer, that the suspicions of Mrs. Farnham, with regard to the Countess St. Alme, were groundless as far as her brother was concerned: and, if the reader will take the trouble to sift every suspected liaison of a similar nature to the bottom, he will probably find that ten out of twelve of all such histories are equally groundless. Under the circumstances, the prudence of Mortimer's conduct in incorrect, would have assumed a c ing than that of a mere want of

In pursuance, however, of his nation, invitations were sent off agreeable of Mortimer's friends Bembridge and Mrs. Delaville, ar more very proper ladies, were big of "ballast" to the gayer portion Jack Batley was of course among;
and every preparation was made t sporting propensities of the men ing, and secure the gayer and n amusements for the ladies in the e

There seemed to Mortimer but courses to pursue. The neighbo "fought shy" of him, therefore was to withdraw within his own

ness of its parties, the varied character of its amusements, and so pique the "puritans" into a regret that they had been so extremely fastidious in the outset.

Helen certainly was not so much enchanted with her rural position as she had anticipated; her natural disposition for sly satire and ridicule found no materials to work upon, nor did her mind exhibit any congeniality with those pursuits which Mortimer had hoped might render her an object of esteem and veneration with the poorer neighbours. The oddness of manner, the strangeness of accent, the mispronunciation of words, or their misapplication to any subject under discussion, into which any of the poor people might be betrayed, were beyond her power of resistance, and she laughed outright, much to the discomfiture of the rustics. In fact, her's was a London mind; and all her fancy for the country, mixed up as it was with marriage and settlement, was little else than an anxiety for change of place and station, blest with the society of the man of her heart.

The clergyman of Sadgrove, a most exemplary man, was amongst those who had paid a visit to the "hall." But, with all his piety and all his zeal for doing good, he was no beauty, and this fact destroyed all his merits in Helen's eyes. It must be confessed that he was what the people call an "object;" and so much did this operate to his disadvantage with Mrs. Mortimer, that she could not trust herself to discuss with him sundry matters relative to Sunday schools and Infant schools, and other establishments in the maintenance of which he was particularly active, lest the extraordinary cast of his countenance and the peculiar tone of his voice should betray her into some inadvertent breach of decorum most unseemly under their relative circumstances.

Mortimer, however, considered it highly important to be extremely benevolent, and to be seen frequently going about the village with the reverend doctor, to consult him as to the best mode of providing for both the spiritual and temporal wants of his parishioners, and, by a moderate sacrifice of time and money, acquire a good name in his neighbourhood, or at all events to do his possible to get rid of a bad one.

It ought not, however, to be concealed from the reader that this life of effort and self-reproach was one of anything but happiness to Mortimer; every word uttered by his friend the Countess, which had reference to "other days," grated upon his ears; and his repentance for having brought her into such immediate contact with his young wife encreased hourly, from the second or third day after their domestication in Worcestershire.

Francis Blocksford, the lady's son, remained only a short time at Sadgrove. His object being to see England previous to entering at Oxford, of which university he was destined to become a future ornament, he proceeded, after a brief sojourn, to London, where his uncle was residing, and to whose care he was consigned. Ridiculous as it may appear, and unaccountable as it may seem, Mortimer felt pleased at his departure. He was a graceful, handsome fellow, and, although not more than seventeen, a French education had given him the air of admiration of Colonel Mortimer altogether unqualified by a restlessness if he had not been ashamed of it. He might almost have fancied jealousy.

He was gone, however, leaving Mrs. Mortimer two of his drawings. The artist, inter alia, he excelled; — a picture of a landscape framed and hung up in her boudoir, a view of Sadgrove; the other a picture of the Chateau de St. Alme, near Blois, which was his most amiable and domestic; — which the Mortimers had visited on an excursion to Tours.

Upon what little things great things are done. These drawings, and their hanging, were not much in themselves, but — universally, the spirit to invigorate and enliven the hall being, as the wine-merchants say of Madeira, all "London particular;" and Mortimer rejoiced while he felt not only that the dulness of Sadgrove but the particular intimacy of his wife and the Countess St. Alme would be broken in upon.

Well! the answers to the nui

One answer which was received to these biddings we ought to give, inasmuch as it may serve to let the reader into another portion of our story, for which, however, he has in some degree been prepared. Ecce!

Grosvenor Street.

"DEAREST HELEN,

Oct. 18—

"Nothing in this world can give me greater pleasure than accepting your and Mor-timer's invitation to Sadgrove. Tell him, I like flint guns still; I may be wrong, but I tried caps and they brought on a degree of deafness: the sharp snap produces this. I will, however, not inflict upon him a poker, which,
as you know but little of the country, I may be permitted to tell you such gentlemen as your husband call a single-barrelled gun.

“ But now, Helen ; —this entre nous—our confidences have lasted long, and have never been broken ; — what do you think ? — I want you to ask two other persons besides myself—inseparable from me now—Lady Melanie Thurston and her daughter—you remember them everywhere. Lady Melanie posted upon every sofa in the world with a sort of tiara on her brow, looking like the figure-head of His Majesty’s ship ‘ Fury,’—enough to make one sick,—pray, ask her,—she longs to go to you,—she lives at 136, Harley Street:—her daughter is nice—very nice—make Mortimer pleased with her. The old lady has a sort of western circuit of friends, and it would suit her very well ; and I really do not see why we might not all go down together : — manage this.

“ I was delighted, after your letter from Paris, to find that you were so soon coming home, and I hope you find Sadgrove all you expected and wished. I remember the Countess St. Alme as Mrs. Blocksford ; she was extremely handsome, and was a daughter of an East-India Director, whose name I at this moment forget — rather satirical — sharp — and so on ; but if I don't mistake my Helen, she is a match for her, at that sort of play.

“ I am vexed to hear that you don't think Mortimer well : as to his spirits, they fluctuate with the weather ; naturally so, the more mercurial they are. As for what you say about shutting out the neighbours, let Mortimer do as he likes.

“ I met poor Ellesmere the day before yesterday. I really believe you did him a mortal injury by refusing him : he seems an excellent person, and has been very much distinguished by a vote of thanks from some great county meeting for something wonderful that he has done. He is certainly not a Liberal in politics, but I believe he spends five or six thousand a year in doing good. I hope Magnus is agreeable, as I hear he is all in all with Mortimer : the affair at Mudbury has damaged him considerably in his importance, and, as I am told, stops a great deal of the swagger of his conversation ; — he was certainly overreached there.

“ As to uncle Jacob, he is unapproachable :

ever much I may lament the e
bably take place before mine, w the 'levis aura.' However, dear well placed, and put beyond a worldly circumstances — lucky I speculate upon is, what Jacob ally do with his wealth. To gi body seems contrary to his pri leave it to any great national equally at variance with his love thing is quite clear — neither yo Mortimer above all, have the slig

“ Now then, Helen, do not Melanie Thurston and her dau infliction of a mother-in-law upon is herself a wife is not much :— secret is out. You may tell it ple in London are really affectionate and kind ; but, of course, we are but few at this time of the year. There are, I believe, about four or five hundred thousand nobodies jostling one another in the City every day, doing what they call ‘ business.’ Brother Jacob amongst the number. But in these parts humanity is extremely scarce. Adieu ! dear Helen : best regards to Mortimer, and believe me “ Affectionately yours,

“ J. BATLEY.”

“ As I suspected,” said Helen to herself — “ my dear Pappy is going to marry again. Well, all my consolation is, that he did not favour me with a commander-in-chief while I was under his roof. Now we shall see what his choice is ; and as I could by no possibility remember my own dear mother, that choice will give me an opportunity of judging of his taste. Thank Heaven ! my chaperon, Lady Bembridge, is not the apple-getting goddess ; for, knowing what I do of her, my poor Pappy, I am sure, would have been bored to death.”

To Mortimer the contents of this letter were imparted, so far as concerned the special invitation, but the letter itself was not thrown down frankly and freely for his uncontrolled perusal: — such was the restraint which thus early in their union had been established, — only by manner, — over the young wife's conduct.

“ Ask them ? ” said Mortimer, — “ to be sure, my dear Helen. You know Lady Melanie Thurston and her daughter — have them down : — let your father be pleased and he pleases me : — besides that, Miss Thurston plays the harp exceedingly well — the only fault of which excellence is, her never knowing when to leave off. However, as music is always a charming excuse for general conversation, she will make it lively : — have them, by all means.”

Everything promised gaiety, and Mortimer himself was gay, which was everything to Helen. The presence of Magnus, she felt, was a sort of weight upon her : he engrossed a good deal of her husband's society, and the solemn pomposity of his manner, and a sort of command he evidently had over his host, acted as, what is generally understood in the world to be, a wet blanket. This, and a certain degree of assumption on the part of the Countess St. Alme, kept Helen in a kind of fever, although as Magnus, who was a great ally of the Countess, said, she had not only begun to bear with her, if not to like her, but was really amused by her vivacity, — all of which, be it recollected, (and it is never too early to date a feeling destined to rankle,) Mortimer attributed rather to her being the mother of the stripling Blocksford, than the friend of his earlier days.

The mind is mysteriously framed; and as no two countenances (which are the indices of minds) are alike, so no two minds exactly resemble each other. Mortimer, the once followed and worshipped idol of his day — flétri to a certain extent — and, being at forty-five or thereaway, a bridegroom, handsome beyond dispute in person, his manly beauty mellowed by time with tints which gave even better effects to his classical features, shrank with diffidence and suspicion from the bright beaming countenance of a handsome young man who was his own godson ! Ay, there it was ! — the affection which he could not fail to feel for the son of the old and favourite friend of his youth, was “sullied o’er” with an envious jealousy of the personal attractions of that very individual, and in his mind the seed was sown. He heard Francis Blocksford talk of his own contemporaries as “old fellows of five-and-forty” — and “old chaps of fifty” — and this before his vivacious Helen, whose eyes, innocently enough, God knows ! were fixed upon the ingenuous countenance of the young Frank, while he was unconsciously planting daggers in the heart of the more matured Mortimer. Ridiculous as this prejudice, — this littleness may appear, it was registered in the heart of the master of Sadgrove, and lay hidden smouldering under the heap of anxieties which swelled it, ready to burst into a flame upon the slightest provocation.

This incubus was removed, — this imaginary peril was gone, but even then, Mortimer seemed restored only to a negative degree of complacency. Magnus and he roamed about with gloom upon their countenances, and St. Alme in vain endeavoured to mingle in their morning strolls, before the time arrived for shooting. There was something altogether uncomfortable in the ménage; and what seemed to render it most uncomfortable of all was, as we have already seen, Mortimer's growing dislike of the perpetual association of his wife and the Countess.

“ I don't think,” said the Countess St. Alme to Helen upon one of these occasions, “ that Mortimer seems as happy as he ought to be ” ——

The calling him Mortimer did not quite please Helen.

—“ With you, my dear Helen.”

That was not entirely agreeable.

—“ He ought to be the happiest of men — his fortune adequate to every luxury of the world, and this place one of the nicest in the kingdom — and with a wife ” ——

“ Oh ! Countess,” said Helen.

“ I am perfectly sincere, my dear Mrs. Mortimer," said the Countess ; " I cannot imagine anything wanting to make this place a perfect paradise."

" It is lovely," said Helen ; " and I am so glad beyond all other things that we are not worried by the visits of the people about the county ; they would bore me to death : and then their visits would be to be returned ; and then we should have to have them here at dinner, and then have to go ten or fifteen miles through dark nights and bad roads to dine with them. I thought, before I was married, I should like to have them to go to, for the sake of laughing at them ; but I am ten times better pleased as it is, especially as Francis is anxious to shut them out."

The Countess listened and looked, and wondered whether Helen were, in truth, unconscious of the real state of the case, at the same time half-inclined to enlighten her : upon this point, however, she thought better ; and resolved to let her remain in a state of blissful ignorance, into which she could not but choose to wonder she had been left so long.

A few days, however, brought down the town-bred guests, and very soon all Sadgrove was filled with les braves convives, Lord William this, Sir Harry that, Colonel one thing, and Captain t'other thing, besides the Dowagers and the Misters, and the Honourable Mistresses, and the Lady Marys, and the Lady Janes, and the guns and the valets, and the maids and the men. Such a gathering never had been seen there, since the death of the late respected Algernon Mortimer, Esq., who slumbered in the family vault in the close-adjoining church, and whose sporting performances in other days were carried on in an extremely different manner, and whose domestic arrangements were wholly at variance with the present free and easy proceedings of his most amiable son and heir, now keeping "wassail" in the ancient hall of his ancestors.

And then to see how the neighbours turned up their eyes and lifted up their hands at the madcap pranks which the goodly company played. The boys of the village were delighted with the skill and agility of the pets innumerable were found neighbouring children. Everyth and benevolence, good-humour and nothing could be more c such gay doings at the mansion.

midst of all this there were eyes minds full of thought; and how thoughtless the motley group of be, the master of Sadgrove wa ease.

“Mortimer,” said the Countess Francis was driving her in a ph some coursing, “I am sure of on you ought to be ashamed of yours

The abruptness of her manner companion, who almost hated he the mother of his namesake.

“And why?” said Mortimer

the ungenerous character of such a feeling, consider its consequences."

"Jealous!" said Mortimer — "ridiculous! And who is the cause of this dreadful excitement?" — and he trembled for her answer; so thoroughly did he despise himself for harbouring a feeling which he could not overcome, and yet dared not to avow.

"Oh! nobody in particular," said the Countess, "your Helen will never give you cause for that sort of jealousy: but you are jealous of the whole world — of every man that comes near her. I know every turn of your mind; you watch her when she speaks — when she looks. If she is talking to the most indifferent person in the room, you seem to haunt the spot where they are seated; if she stroll out of sight, even with my poor dear little ugly old husband, out you go and follow them: — now this is all wrong, Mortimer. If anything in the world can spoil a fine ingenuous character, such conduct as yours is sure to do it. Conscious of no ill intention, a young woman of high spirit and candid disposition cannot fail

“ You mistake me, Countess
mer. “ I admit that I feel a s about Helen in society, but not j has a habit of saying things w wound, and this half unintention she does not know how to restr what she thinks she speaks; and is mine, I feel a certain degree bility : — I — in short, I am afraid mitting herself.”

“ No, Mortimer,” said the Countess, “ I cannot give you not that flattering unction to your frankness and ingenuousness were, told me, what won you : it is not they should offend, but a dread lest please too much, that agitates you you like a troubled spirit hovering

Poor Mr. Blocksford was addicted to something extremely like the course you are now pursuing,—it never answers, Mortimer.”

The conclusion to which the Countess came, after citing her own case as one in point, was, to say the least of it, whimsical; and Mortimer could not resist observing that, since the Countess argued from experience, he would endeavour to check a habit of which she accused him, but of the existence of which he did not admit himself to be conscious.

To a man mistrustful of himself, rather than of his young and fascinating wife, nothing is so annoying as even the most frivolous allusions to the most trifling circumstances made by the early friends of the lady, they being persons who, for all the husband knows, might have been in other days aspirants for her hand.

“Do you remember,” said Lord William, “my dear Mrs. Mortimer, that joke one evening at Lady Summerville’s, about you and the pine-apple and the bouquet.”

“Oh, perfectly,” replied Mrs. Mortimer, “and you on your knees like Romeo in the garden.”

“ And the Ascot day,” cried Sir Harry, “ when three hearts were broken at one blow.”

“ I never shall forget that ;” answered Mrs. Mortimer, laughing exceedingly, “ and to see poor Lord Robert after the éclaircissement.”

“ That was altogether a most agreeable excursion, Helen,” said the Honourable Mrs. Petherton, “ I wonder you ever gave up blue ribands after those verses—don’t you remember ?”

“ Oh ! perfectly,” replied Mrs. Mortimer, “ I assure you I have got them perfectly safe,—for, to say truth, they were very pretty.”

“ Is poor Tom dead, Mrs. Mortimer ?” pathetically asks Sir Harry.

“ Oh dear no !” replies Mrs. Mortimer, “ on the contrary he is in Italy, married, and, as the people say, well to do.”

Now all these references to long by-gone nothings kept Mortimer upon the rack ; the ease and gaiety with which Helen, who of course knew (which he did not) the real nature and character of the circumstances and incidents of which her friends were speaking, appeared to him misplaced levity, and evidence of a frivolity which pained him; and then the whole scene between his avowed rival Ellesmere at Lady Saddington's, and Batley's letter of recall after he had taken his departure for the Continent recurred to his mind, and then, gazing with a mingled feeling of delight and doubt upon his laughing wife, he muttered to himself Lord Townley's opening question in the play, "Why did I marry?"

The arrival of Helen's father and his friends the Thurstons (mother and daughter) seemed a favourable epoch at which Mortimer should begin the correction of this scrutinizing habit; inasmuch as if, although Helen were yet unconscious of it, it were sufficiently evident to attract the notice of others, Batley would in all probability himself observe it. He, therefore, determined, for the next week at least, to banish all solicitude, and enjoy if possible the gaiety with which he had surrounded himself.

Batley, luckily, was in particularly high spirits, and seemed to be in the highest degree of favour with his ladies; and when Mr. John chose to make the agreeable, nobody could better succeed :—as he was now avowedly on his promotion, there could be little doubt of the activity of his exertions.

“ Do you think her pretty, Helen ?” said Jack to his daughter, speaking of Miss Thurston.

“ Ye-es !” said Helen, “ pretty, but gauche ; she seems always straining after effect ;—her harp is agreeable, but there is no feeling—none of that soul-fraught energy which gives music and everything else its real value to me.”

“ Come, come, Helen,” said Batley, “ recollect in her you see your future belle mère, and I must insist upon your duty.”

“ Rely upon me,” said Helen. “ And when is it to be, Pappy.”

“ Why the matter has not gone that length yet,” said the matured lover ; “ I should say a few days now would settle it.”

“ But you are accepted, I presume,” said Helen, with a kind of mock dignity and a patronising air.

“ Oh !” said Jack, “ that part of the story is all understood. I have put the case hypothetically, and Laura and her mother are, as the people say, ‘quite agreeable.’ I think that our domestication here for the next week will afford the most favourable opportunity imaginable of concluding the negotiations, and it would be particularly agreeable to me to receive the hand of so amiable a person under the roof of her who has been so many years my companion and my delight ;—entre nous, Helen,—not that I am worldly,—the young lady has forty thousand pounds, besides the reversion of Mamma’s jointure when she dies.”

“Why, you will be the envy of all the fortune-hunters in London !” said Helen.

“Lady Bembridge is in her airs about it,” said Batley ; “she fancied herself the object of my solicitude, but, as I say, Helen, a man is so much younger for his years than a woman, that it is but fair to make a due allowance. Mortimer and you, for instance, are admirably suited ;—I,—to be sure, there is a difference between Mortimer’s age and mine, and I have what is erroneously called the advantage, but still Laura is older than you, and so that brings the matter all right."

"I wish," said Helen, "I could see Mortimer more lively; as I wrote to you, he seems to have something preying on his mind which affects him more particularly here."

"Shall I tell you, Helen?" said Jack: "I have always made your confidence with an implicit reliance on your natural good sense, and, in what I am going to say, I only afford an additional proof of my estimation of your character. You must not notice, nor care for, and especially not notice to him, or let him see that you do care for, the gloom about which you speak; it is connected with circumstances of other days:—tell me,—has he been to church yet?"

"No!" said Helen, opening her bright black eyes with an expression of wonder at the question which was so unexpected and yet so pertinent, "no! but what of that?—he has had a cold; besides, he went last week to Welsford church,—and last Sunday——"

“ Hush, hush, my Helen !” said Batley, “ never mind what other church he visits : I speak only of this. You know, for I told you before you married him, all the circumstances of his unfortunate affair with Lady Hillingdon ?”

“ Ah !” said Helen, and those fine eyes which erst brightened with surprise were raised to heaven with an expression of painful regret, “ I thought of that, but—”

“ Do not agitate yourself, my child,” said Batley, “ nor fancy that any recollection of Lady Hillingdon is to interfere with your entire happiness and comfort ; all will be well in time ; but I know (for Magnus has told me) the dread that Mortimer has of first visiting the church here, — under the family pew of the Mortimers lies buried the woman who sacrificed everything for him. In the human mind some one single circumstance of a long life stands registered deeply and firmly, from which the heart revolts as soon as it recurs. All the wrongs Mortimer did, all the sacrifices he made, all the punishment he has undergone, all the sorrows he has felt, are summed up and concentered in that one spot, that one object. If he could muster sufficient resolution once to revisit that tomb, the spell would be broken, and by degrees he would even derive consolation from his visits to it."

"But, father," said Helen, "when you tell me this, do you expect me to derive consolation from the intelligence, or that my anxiety about Mortimer is likely to be decreased by knowing that his grief arises from the loss of one to whom I am the unworthy successor?"

"No, Helen, no!" said Batley, "you mistake the point of my observation upon his conduct. The struggle now going on in his mind is not between regret for his former wife and affection for you; the conflict is merely with regard to the one particular fact of what, in common parlance, is called 'breaking the ice.' Time will do this, but, as I tell you, I know the state of his feelings upon this particular point, and know also the dread he has of making a scene before the congregation which might result from an inconsiderate effort to master these feelings prematurely."

It must be confessed that Helen after this conversation was by no means more assured of the transient nature of Mortimer's grief than she was before it took place. In fact, she was conscious of an absence of that entirety of affection which, with all her characteristic enthusiasm, she had anticipated in marrying the man of her heart; and, although her father might have arrived at a time of life when mere worldly considerations are supposed to influence what the Morning Post would call the "votaries of Hymen," she felt rather sorry than pleased that her vernal parent had given her so sad a clue to the abstraction of her absent husband.

Batley, however, rallied her into a smiling humour, and left her to dress, with an injunction not to take the slightest notice of Mortimer's melancholy or its cause; and, added he, as he whisked himself out of his daughter's boudoir, "Don't make a particular confidante of the Countess St. Alme."

This last hint, coupled with the tone of the Countess's innuendoes as to Mortimer, sent Helen to her dressing-room with thoughts feelings which ought not to fill the bosom of a noble-minded girl less than three months married.

CHAPTER IX.

THE conversation which Helen had held with her animated parent was by no means calculated to tranquillize her mind. As far as expounding to her the cause of Mortimer's gloom and restlessness, it was, however, to a certain extent, satisfactory ; for although a knowledge of the strength of his feelings for another, might not be particularly gratifying, still it relieved her from all apprehension that she was herself the cause of his melancholy and disorder.

Her father's caution about the Countess troubled her : she had, to please and gratify Francis, forced herself to like her ; she had become familiarized with the brusquerie and abruptness of her manner ; and if she had not made her a confidante, she felt no dislike to her society. Once or twice, when speaking of Mortimer, Helen thought she perceived on her part to refer more particularly to the history of his early life than was either necessary or agreeable, and an expression of regret why he should permit the recollection of the past to mar the brightness of the present.

"My course," said Helen to herself, "is clear: doing no wrong, what have I to regret? This sadness of Mortimer's will pass off in time: I will neither question him about it, nor even appear conscious of its existence; but endeavour, by making everything around us as gay and cheerful as possible, to divert him, as I hope, from its influence."

This admirable and wise determination, however, was more difficult of execution than it appeared. Helen, in the innocence of her heart, did not perceive that even the vivacious society of her father was particularly agreeable to Mortimer, and that the effect of producing its wonted effect; his mirth was misplaced; his "gallant, gay" professions now appeared to Mortimer almost ridiculous, and he felt an awkwardness, — a dis-in fact,—in the mode and topics of their conversations, which, unlike their intercourse in other days, were seldom reduced to a tête-à-tête. Jack, who was sufficiently quick and alive to passing circumstances, saw the change, and felt it; but attributing it to the one “great cause” which he had established in his mind, and communicated to Helen, it had but little effect upon him, and he rattled and flirted and fluttered away, with more than his usual activity.

“Pray, Helen,” said Mortimer, “as I presume you to be in your father’s confidence, which of the two ladies down here under his patronage is the object of his ambition—the mother or the daughter?”

“How can you ask, my dear Francis?” said Helen. “If my dear Pappy were to hear you imagine a doubt, he would die of the shock:—the daughter, to be sure.”

“Oh!” replied Mortimer—“then he is not so wise a person as I supposed:—true, the mother’s jointure reverts to Miss Laura at her death, but ——”

“ Laura,” said Helen, “ is not so young as she looks, and I think will make a very respectable mother-in-law.”

“ I think her detestable !” said Mortimer. “ Flippancy and pertness in a woman are qualified in a certain degree by youth and beauty ; but when the one is past, and the other does not exist, an off-hand tone of superiority, such as Miss Thurston thinks proper to assume, is, at least to me, exceedingly offensive.”

“ Her mistake is excusable, Francis, even upon your own principle,” said Helen ; “ for she does not consider herself old, nor think herself plain.”

“ Well,” said Mortimer, “ self-deception is a vice, or folly, — whichever you please, — of a most extensive character, if a woman of her age and appearance can still believe herself what she so decidedly is not. I confess, if for my sins I were condemned to be chained to either of them, the dowager would be my choice.”

“ Papa,” said Helen, “ prefers the lesser evil.”

“ Evil, indeed !” said Mortimer with a sigh, and then relapsed into one of those fits of abstraction, from which Helen did not venture to awaken him.

“ I shall not shoot to-day,” said Francis after a pause of a few minutes ; “ Magnus and I are going to ride over to Worcester. I will go, however, before we start, and make arrangements for those who like to go out, and you will make your party for the morning as you please.”

“ Are you going on business, Francis ?” said Helen.

“ Why, yes,” replied Francis, “ partly on business, — but we shall be back long before dinner ; so try and live without me for a few hours.”

These words, accompanied as they were by a “ chaste salute,” were delivered in a tone by no means agreeable to Helen’s ear ; and what made them still less acceptable was, that by an almost unconscious feeling they became mysteriously associated in her mind with the conversation she had had with the Countess St.

Alme, as to Francis's insensibility to the value of the treasure which he possessed in her."

"I will try," said Helen; "but, dear Francis, it will be a trial, for when can I be so happy here as when you are here too."

"Ha, ha!" said Francis, "you are a dear, good girl, and, if the world does not spoil you, will mellow down into a most domestic wife:—only," added he, "don't cry; don't dim those bright black eyes by weeping, even if Magnus and I should be too late for dinner. I should have felt some compunctious visitings in leaving you to manage the wide world of a country-house 'all alone by yourself,' but as 'Pappy,' as you call him, is here, he will relieve you from all that embarrassment; he can make himself 'at home' anywhere."

And the tone in which these words were spoken was not harmonious. The remarks of the Countess again flashed into her mind.—"What on earth has made him dissatisfied with me or my father?" thought Helen. "My father is a cleverer man than Francis; my father is"—

Hold, temper, hold ! Has the adored Mortimer, the admired of all admirers, already sunk thus in the estimation of his wife ? It is not doubt of his affection that has produced all this ; it is, first, an air of command which he has assumed, a superiority which a woman of ardent mind and feelings cannot brook ; this combined with his abstraction and grief — and all this again with the Countess's observations — and all this again and again with her father's injunction, not to make a confidante of the Countess. Well ! ——

“ Yes, Francis,” said Helen, “ my father is a very agreeable person, and you always thought him so ; and I believe your first beginning to like me was, because you esteemed and admired him ; that is my pride and pleasure.”

“ Who upon earth, Helen, said or thought I did not !” said Mortimer. “ I merely observed, — and unless you were disposed to quarrel, my observation would have passed unnoticed except by a laugh, that your father made himself at home everywhere. I meant nothing offensive ; and certainly, if there be any house in England where he may do most effectively, it is in this, where his daughter is mistress, and rules all hearts."

Again, the sneering manner of Francis ried Helen, but she felt herself above the influence of anger — she never had felt a towards Francis — and above the reach of thing, strange to say! except the observation of the Countess St. Alme, — "He does value you; he does not know the worth of the treasure he possesses."

Poor Helen ran over in her mind all things she had said and done which could have been likely to excite Mortimer's ill-temper which she began to fear he possessed : what more than an average quantity, but she could tax herself with nothing. Did her plainness offend him? — impossible! because he himself had spoken, if not harshly, at least strongly, as to his suspicions that the life of the Countess St. Alme was objectionable her. She had been civil to his friends and guests; she had, and he knew her mother had endeavoured to make the place gay; no he exhibit anything but the greatest kindness to her in company,—as we have already said, perhaps a somewhat too watchful kindness in its way. The real misfortune of the match was,—and she began to discover it thus soon, however much too late it might be,—that Mortimer, who as a “dandy” of some twenty years before had established a character for talent and accomplishment, founded chiefly upon buoyant spirits and a fine person, did not, in point of fact, however much he might deceive himself into the belief that he did, possess one single attribute likely to attract or chain a mind like Helen’s.

Well then, when to this unfortunate incongruity and want of sympathy were superadded the gnawing regret and cankering remorse, on the part of Mortimer, for deeds of other days, it did not seem very unnatural that he — also too late — discovered that his project for reform and regeneration, into a new life of domestic happiness and respectability, was not so likely to turn out well as he had anticipated. There certainly was something in his manner as he left Helen upon this occasion which was painful in the extreme to her.

What still increased this feeling, — though she dreaded to inquire or know of the cause of his strange behaviour developed themselves so disagreeably on surface, — was, the admonition of her father as to the Countess, who certainly had excited a feeling in Helen's breast, not perhaps a strong one, by throwing out hints that her father was not so happy as he ought to be in his domestic circle. Helen resolved to keep her bright beautiful countenance in smile and when she rejoined the party nobody could have guessed what was passing in her mind unless perhaps it was the Countess St. Aubert herself, who, when the mistress of the manor announced that its master was going on an excursion that morning, accompanied by Colonel Magnus, and that she should be sole mistress of the day, gave her a look which she felt understood, and which implied that even a host of friends about him there was something more attractive out of Sadgrove than

it. Helen saw the glance, and felt its import and influence; but dashing away the black ringlets from her snowy forehead, as if typical of casting from her mind all dark thoughts, she turned from the scrutinizing eye of the more than half Frenchwoman to the smiling countenances of her other visitors, in order to make the essential arrangements for putting them all into motion in the most agreeable possible manner to themselves.

Batley, as far as he was concerned, proposed having the negative satisfaction of remaining "at home;" for, according to Mortimer's just view of his character, so did he designate Sadgrove. Helen soon discovered his reason for this announcement of his domestication; Laura Thurston had got the head-ache,—Lady Melanie would stay with her. Batley saw in the head-ache a ruse, because, Batley's own ways being tortuous, he never believed that anybody ever said or did anything without a motive. He had expressed a sort of half intention at breakfast of not shooting,—Laura after breakfast had a head-ache,—"put that and that together," (as the wicked woman said to the nosed Justice, it makes something,) and, accordingly, Batley, the Evergreen Batley, found the sudden announcement of the young lady (young perhaps by courtesy) painful more of sympathy than sickness, and that she had merely fashioned her complaint to the purpose of the moment, and having, as she conceived, previously given sundry indications of a desire to come to an explanation of her views and intentions, considered that day, when he was not to be out, a fitting opportunity for him to make his declaration.

There is nothing in the world so curious to look at as the mind of a cunning man, — not a conjurer, but a man who thinks he is carrying on his schemes, and manœuvring and keeping everybody else in the dark as to his designs and intentions. Addison says that "cunning is only the mimic of discretion, and may be put upon weak men, in the same manner as vivacity is often mistaken for wit, and gravity for wisdom." When Batley heard of the head-ache, his cunning made him certain of his point, he smirked and simpered proportionably ; although, in fact, whatever might have been Miss Thurston's opinion of, and feelings towards him, the poor thing had a real bond fidé head-ache. Batley's own constant practice of the art in which he thought himself an adept, and in the exercise of which he preferred getting at an easily attained object by a circuitous road than by a short one, convinced him that this was a plan, that the heart of the lady was more affected than the head, and that this day was to be the day " big with the fate " of himself and Laura.

What the object of Mortimer's visit to Worcester might be, Helen no further sought to know ; nor would she have cared about it, but for the look of that Countess who became a greater object of interest in her eyes since Pappy had warned her not to make a friend of her.

There is an old story, which has been very often told, of a man, probably something like Mortimer, who had married a girl something like Helen, and who had a friend probably something like Magnus, and the friend sceptical somewhat as to the obedient tenor of the young wife's disposition, much to the dissatisfaction of the Benedick, who strongly asserted and warmly asseverated that his wife was law, and that she never by any chance disobeyed any wish or injunction of his.

"Have you ever tried her temper in this respect?" said the friend: "have you positively desired her not to do any particular thing? for that is my point, since you tell me she never refuses to do whatever you order her to do."

"No!" said the affectionate husband: "I never have found occasion to desire her to do anything, but—"

"That's it! as the old women say," said the friend, "female obedience is proved in negatives; tell her not to do any particular thing, give her no particular reason why, and see if she does not do it."

"Ridiculous!" says the husband.

we are both going away for the day :”—just as Mortimer and Magnus were,—“ what proof shall I put her to ? what shall I tell her not to do ? may she not play her harp ? must she not sing, or draw ? or, in fact, tell me what you want me to prohibit her doing, and I stake my life she does it not.”

“ Oh no !” said the friend, “ drawing, and singing, and playing the harp are things which she might abstain from without a murmur, or, what is more essential to the affair, a wonder ; because she has sung, and played, and drawn a thousand times ; it is an injunction not to do something she never has done before, — for instance, tell her when we go, not to climb some particular hill, for particular reasons which you do not choose to give her ; or, by way of carrying the principle out to its fullest extent, warn her not to attempt to ride on Neptune’s back.”

“ Neptune’s back !” said the husband.

“ Yes !” replied the friend, “ on the back of this most valued Newfoundland dog, the bravest and faithfullest of his breed.”

“ Ride on a dog’s back !” exclaimed Benedick, “ how can you be so absurd ? — if — ”

“ Ah ! there it is,” said the friend, “ as i — now, take my word for it, if you issue th injunction without giving her any reason Harriet will break it.”

The most incredulous of men rejoiced the idea, which he felicitously ridiculed, and resolved upon trying the experiment in order to establish his Harriet’s superiority of mind and his friend’s exceeding silliness.

He parted from his Harriet, and with tender fondness she clung round his shoulder, as said in quitting her,

“ Harriet, dearest, we have seldom been separated since our marriage, — I shall be back soon — take care of yourself, love, — but just attend to one thing I am going to say dear, don’t try to ride upon Neptune’s back while we are away.”

“ What !” said the laughing Harriet, “ riding upon Neptune, — ha, ha, ha ! what an odd idea — is that all you warn me against ? — why, wh a ridiculous notion ! why should you tell me that ? What nonsense !”

“ That, my dear,” said the husband, “ is a secret ; all I beg of you is, not to ride upon Neptune.”

“ Ride upon Neptune !” repeated the lady, and she laughed again, and they parted.

When Benedick and his friend returned to dinner, the laughing Harriet did not as usual present herself to receive them ; there was a sort of gloom pervading the house ; the footman who opened the door looked dull ; the butler who came into the hall looked as white as his waistcoat ; the lady’s own maid rushed down stairs evidently to prevent a scene.

“ Where is your mistress ?” said Benedick.

“ Up-stairs, sir !” said the maid, “ there is nothing the matter, sir,—nothing in the world, sir,—only my mistress has had a fall,—quite a little fall on the walk in the flower garden,—and has cut her face, the least bit in the world, sir ; all will be well in a couple of days.

“ A fall !” said Benedick.

“ Humph !” said his friend.

And up-stairs ran the anxious husband

“What has happened?” exclaimed catching her to his heart, and seeing her beautiful countenance a little marred,—“how has this happen?”

Harriet cried, and hid her face.

The explanation never came altogether fully before the friend or the family; but the accident was generally thought to have arisen from Harriet’s having endeavoured to take a walk upon Neptune’s back.

The Countess St. Alme was the Neptunian at Sadgrove; the warning Helen had received coupled with the other odd circumstances which have been already noticed, excited the fated lady of the mansion to increase rather than diminish the intimacy which already existed between them; and, resolving to lose no time in ascertaining the justice of the prediction, proposed, as one of the arguments of that very morning, to drive the Countess in the pony phaeton herself.

Thus while the daughter had determined to try the temper of her friend, the had decided to essay his fortune with the object of his choice ; and a very nice morning's work it was, all things considered.

There is an axiom, for the perfect truth of which every living man and many living women can safely vouch ; and this axiom says quaintly enough " Wrong never comes right." No community in the known world could be better cited in illustration of its wisdom than the little circle at Sadgrove ; the errors and indiscretions of foregone days cast their baleful influence over even the healthiest branches of the family tree ; and as it is invariably the case that one falsehood begets ten thousand, so the delicacies and difficulties connected with the occurrences of Mortimer's earlier life led to a series of little tricks and unworthy manoeuvres which were considered necessary to keep the blemishes out of sight.

The drive, however, took place ; and Mrs. Mortimer, having parcelled out her party, and paired those who wished to be together, with all the bienséance of London life, started with her friend on their little expedition.

“What,” said the Countess, “has Francis to Worcester?”

The recurrence of her husband’s name in the conversation of her fair friend all times sounded harsh and discordant to-day particularly so; probably, because of the time and manner in which the question put seemed almost indescribably to tally with the spirit and expression of Mortimer’s remark upon her father previous to his departure.

“I have not an idea,” said Helen; “I presume to enquire into his proceedings.”

“I suppose he and his friend” (with particular emphasis) “have some very interesting engagement.”

“I believe they are gone on business,” said Helen, wishing to stop the course of inquiry, which, although she disdained to follow, it agitated and annoyed her.

“What business they can have at Worcester,” said the Countess, “except to buy service of porcelain, a packet of gloves, a pocket of hops, I cannot guess: perhaps they are gone to visit some friend of other days.”

the way, dear — did Francis ever show you his picture of Amelia?—it was a wonderfully fine likeness.

“No!” said Helen, and her voice faltered,—she thought the question rather extraordinary, and strangely timed; she was not surprised that he never had shown it to her, and yet now she felt discontented that he had not, since he knew she was aware of all the circumstances connected with his first marriage.

“You have seen her monument, Helen,” said the Countess.

“No!” said Helen.

“It is immediately at the back of your pew,” said the Countess; “I wonder you never noticed it.”

“I seldom notice anything at church, Countess,” said Helen.

“Oh!” replied the Countess, “I am quite aware of your devotion, of the abstraction which it induces, and all that; but I should have thought you would have felt an interest in looking at that, apart from idle curiosity:—shall we go there now?—do,—I should like you to see it ; it is in the best possible taste, and I think Francis will be pleased to know that you have seen it."

Helen was extremely puzzled how to act ; she felt a dread of complying with her companion's suggestions, and a fear of opposing them. She thought she should like to see the monument, but she thought that Francis would be displeased by her visiting it with the Countess, or rather, without him, since he had never referred to the subject which, nevertheless, she was told, was nearest his heart.

" No ! " said Helen ; " I differ with you there Countess ; if Mortimer wished me to see the monument, he would either have spoken of it to me, or shown it me himself."

" He would give the world to do so," said the Countess, " but he cannot muster sufficient resolution to look at it ; if once that struggle were over, he would again visit the church as usual, his absence from which is not calculated to allay the prejudice which exists against him in the neighbourhood.

" Is there a prejudice against him ? " said

Helen, listening with fearful anxiety to her companion, who seemed of late to take especial pleasure in detracting from Mortimer's merits.

"Prejudice!" said the Countess; "why, my dear Helen, you are not blind to that? what else makes Sadgrove as much a desert as it was in the time of its late mistress? not one of the county people come near it."

"No!" said Helen, "because Mortimer declines their society, which bores him, and prefers that in which he delights."

"And does he really make you believe all this?" said the Countess: "pray, my dear girl, how has he manifested his disinclination to receive them in his house? have they ever made any advances for him to repulse?"

"As for my part," said Helen, "I hate neighbours, and I hate travelling about to dull distant dinners and dowdy dances,—so I have told him, and for that reason——"

"—He would no doubt decline the civilities of the county people," said the Countess, "if they were offered; but no—even the family of the clergyman, so much here as he is on business with Francis, have confined their attentions to a call when they were certain you were out, which you and I returned when they were not at home."

"I know," said Helen, "Francis told me, he thought it best not to invite them here."

"— Because," said the Countess St. Alme—" he could not have borne the mortification of a negative answer."

"Not the least!" exclaimed Helen, in a vindicatory tone; "they would be too happy come, but he thought it better to postpone the invitation till some of our London guests were gone, and that, partly at my suggestion; I declare, good as he is, and all that sort of thing, there is something so eminently absurd in the countenance of the worthy doctor, that I dread a day of them."

"Well, then!" said the Countess, "you will not go to see the tomb this morning?"

"No!" said Helen, "on Sunday after church I will look at it, and will tell Francis that I have looked at it; I have no disguise from him."

"Poor dear girl!" said the Countess, in a tone which could not be mistaken : — “ here, I declare, is your most excellent parent and the Thurstons taking a particularly domestic-looking ride, after all the history of the head-ache and staying at home, — it would be the height of barbarity to join them, therefore turn short to the left, down this lane, and leave them to their interesting conversation.”

Helen did as she was bid, not that she would have been at all sorry if the interesting conversation in which she herself was engaged with her companion had been put an end to. As, however, she felt that it would, “ under existing circumstances,” be more agreeable to her father to be left with his companions to pursue their ramble, the ponies were wheeled round and trotted away as fast as they could patter along a beautifully wooded road which Helen had never before traversed. Emerging from the trees which shaded the first part of it, they came upon a sort of terrace cut along the side of a gently rising hill and overhanging the Severn, which rippled and glittered at their feet most beautifully.

“What an extremely pretty drive!” said Helen. “I think our meeting papa was quite a fortunate event, since it sent us in this direction.”

“Have you never been this road before?” said the Countess.

“No,” replied Helen, “I seldom attempt to explore; I keep the beaten tracks.”

“—But did Francis never bring you this way?” said the Countess.

“No,” replied Helen.

“You surprise me,” said the Countess; — “but, to be sure, it is all part of the same delusion. Drive on, and when we come to that gate on the left you must turn in, and you will see one of the prettiest spots in the whole of Sadgrove.”

Helen again obeyed the instructions of her guide; and when they reached the gate, and the servant rode forward to open it, the Countess, whose free and easy manner in commanding every member of the household was more remarkable than agreeable to Mrs. Mortimer, enquired of the man, "if he knew where the key was?"

"They keep it, my lady," said the man, "at Willis's farm-house."

"Go forward then and get it," said the Countess, "and we will drive round by the shrubbery and meet you."

A touch of the brim of his hat was Stephens's practical reply, and off he cantered towards Willis's farm.

"What place are we going to?" said Helen, who saw directly that it must be some very well known endroit, from the manner in which its key was spoken of, and the knowledge which the man possessed as to the place of its keeping.

"I'll not tell you till you see it, dear," said the Countess; "I like to surprise people sometimes. Go on—drive gently—and here to the right, into that copse, and down this tonnelle—it is rather steep:—but is it not charming,—those little glimpses of the river shining through the underwood?—Now, now to the left — and there !” exclaimed the Countess in a tone of ecstasy, as the little phaeton stood in front of a picturesque building which she announced to Helen as “The Fishing-House.”

So well did the Countess know the count that Stephens, and an old woman from Willfarm with the key of this Fishing-House, reached the spot at the moment of their arrival. With curtsies most respectful, and that flush which an unexpected visit always causes in humble life, the poor old body, with trembling hand, applied the key to the door.

“I am so sorry, madam,” said she: “it is almost the only day this year I have regularly opened the Fishing-House in the morning; but to-day — dear, dear me — I am so sorry! I won’t be a minute opening the shutters, — deary me!”

“Oh!” said the Countess, who always led the way, “don’t hurry yourself, we will get out of the carriage and walk round to the back, and by that time you will have everything all ready for us. Come, Helen, dear, — leave the phaeton here, and I will take you through the prettiest flower-garden in all the world."

Helen wondered, but almost instinctively obeyed her guest.

"How extremely beautiful this is!" said Helen.

"I thought you would admire it," said the Countess. "Come—this way."

And she led her through one of the sweetest and gayest parterres that ever bloomed, to a straight terrace-walk of no great extent, but which led to what might be considered the front entrance of the building. By the time they had reached it, the poor old body had got the shutters opened, and was assiduously employed in dusting this and putting right that, labouring under all the horrors of an imputation of neglect of duty.

The Fishing-House consisted of a circular room divided into six compartments, in three of which were windows overhanging the river. In the one opposite to the centre window was a fire-place, on either side of which, occupying room, and a boudoir or dressing case might be. The view from the site, and there was a brightness sparkling around it, and a serenity within it, which might be the greatest and gayest sigh and s

—— “If there’s peace to be found
A heart that is humble might hold

But no : — the repose and tranquillity its natural attributes offered were destined neither for humble proud ones. The thatched white “gentility-aping” cottage, as it, was a mere superficial coat of slated roof, and as little indication of happiness within, as the ing of its master towards his and as Helen cast her eyes around it, the Countess whispered ——

“Is it not strange that you should not have been here before?”

“Does it belong to Francis?” said Helen.

“Belong to him !” said the Countess, “why, my dear love, it used to be his principal residence when ——”

“—I understand,” said Helen, who thought she observed the old woman somewhat attentively listening to the remarks of the Countess.

“I concluded you had been here,” said the amiable lady, “or I should have proposed a drive hither a week ago.”

“No,” said Helen, feeling her cheeks burn with humiliation that she should have been indebted to her friend for the induction into so lovely and so popular a portion of her domain.

The Countess saw what was passing in Helen’s mind.

“Why, my dear,” said she, “this used to be the favourite retreat of her who is gone; and here Francis and she passed, during the summer months, the greatest portion of their time :

... must have been extrem

“ It is beautiful !” said Hele

“ Since you were here last, i old woman addressing the Cou man has cut down them two the end of the walk, which let the church tower, as you said i

“ Yes,” said the Countess, l ably confused, “ Yes—I recolle great improvement.”

“ We did not expect to se again, ma’am,” continued the rustic, “ or we would have had clipped, as you desired.”

“ Oh !” said the Countess, well as it is.”

“ What !” said Helen, “ hav lately ?”

“Thursday-week, I think, ma’am,” replied the rustic :—and had she gone no farther, all might have been extremely well ; but the rustic added, — “and then Mr. Mortimer said, he did not think he should be here again till next Saturday.”

Helen heard all this, and felt her head whirl, her eyes swimming, and her tongue clinging to the roof of her mouth. What ! had Mortimer, who dared not venture to take her to this favourite retreat of his former wife, brought the Countess hither, and not one syllable said of the visit, — no, nor even of the existence of the Fishing-House itself.

“ — But,” continued the old body, “if you wish, ma’am, to have those curtains which I showed you, put up, instead of the crimson ones, they can be done in three or four days.”

What ! ordering furniture—making arrangements—giving directions ! — Helen could bear this no longer : the spirit was roused.

“Pray,” said Helen, firing up, her cheeks

... simple body, who, although taken of the roasted sheep, a ale, on the festive day, had from the potency of her imbi ter article—made herself suff ed with the person of the squ recognize her on her second who, being one of those hu in the midst of their work h to be vivacious, considered course that the lady who cam mer's phaeton to Mr. Mortimer' so soon after his return to Sa new wife, was that happy indiv

“How very ridiculous!” said
—“why, my good woman, t/Mortimer!”

“Dear, dear. dear me!”

“ I wonder, as you see us at church,” said the Countess, “ that you should not have known.”

“ — Dear, dear, dear !” said the old woman, “ I ’m sure, ma’am, I beg a thousand pardons ! — I hope, ma’am, you won’t be offended with me.”

“ Not in the least,” said Helen with a toss of her head ; “ the mistake seems to me the most natural in the world.”

“ There,” said the Countess, “ you may go ; — we will walk round the terrace.”

The Countess saw that the fire had been kindled, which it would take some time to deaden ; and as she did not wish even so humble a personage as the old body from Willis’s farm to be a spectator of the scene she anticipated, she despatched her as speedily as possible.

Helen said nothing, but she felt as if she were dying, — and die she would, she resolved, before one single symptom of what was passing in her mind should exhibit itself.

“ What a curious contretemps,” said the even know of the existence of retreat: the truth is, we had you, and it is my fault that it came here to give directions that all put in nice order to surprise impression was, that all the arrangements been made, but these stupid people

“Countess,” said Helen, she drops which, spite of her re-upon her long black lashes, “I with surprises like this. If I bear to revisit this favourite room what circumstances rendered it to come hither with you? Of the concealment which kept from ledge the very existence of such place has no charms for me except in my mind were connected with it ; and nothing but common delicacy could have been necessary to have kept me from thinking of it as my own loved place of rest.

“ Dear Helen,” said the Countess, “ I am quite aware how easy it is to render by a combination of circumstances the simplest and most innocent of our actions suspicious if not odious. It was I, who rallied Francis upon his gloom, and told him how much better it would be if he at once resolved to familiarize himself with the scenes of other days, and visit those favourite spots in which he had passed so much of his time :—this was one—he declared the utter impossibility of his ever seeing it again. I persuaded,—entreated him for your sake to come hither, and at last succeeded in prevailing upon him to do so. I further gave such directions to the woman here as might as much as possible alter its general appearance from what it formerly was, and hence at his own suggestion the change of furniture and other arrangements : why this poor woman should have mistaken me for you, it is impossible for recollections were to be ass the wife of him who——”

“—No !” interrupted the this peculiar case. Mortimer curious one ; I have known To you he feels he cannot s ter : he is even ignorant how ledge of the circumstances of affair extends. He considers it impossible to touch upon the all upon its details, all of which been involved in your conversation you had visited this place some preparation.”

“ Could he not have come said Helen.

“ He never would have com

“ I could have lived without it,” said Helen mournfully, — “ and better so, than have recovered it thus.”

“ I have but one condition to make with you,” said the Countess, — “ that you will not mention one word to Francis of our visit here to-day.”

“ Why so ?” said Helen, — “ more disguises, more hypocrisy ! why, Countess, why am I doomed to live a life of dissimulation which I abhor and detest ?”

“ You do not know his temper,” said the Countess ; “ if he knew that I had anticipated the arrangements we proposed, and frustrated his design, he would be outrageous.”

“ Then why, why,” said Helen, “ did you bring me hither ? If my husband, to whom my heart is open as the day, can keep so closely hidden from me, thoughts and actions having reference to comparatively trifling matters like these, what confidence — what security can I have that I am trusted at all ?”

“ What then,” said the Countess, “ if everything goes on smoothly and the days pass happily, it matters little whether you know all that occupies your husband's mind !”

“ Oh, Countess, Countess !” said Helen, “ if that had been my creed, I never would have become a wife. I am sure,” added she, “ that in all that has happened about this place, which, beautiful as it is, I now shall hate, you are not to blame ; but I think I should be very much to blame if I permitted this evening to pass over my head without telling Mortimer that I had been here, and all I know upon the subject.”

“ Do as you like, my dear Helen,” said the Countess : “ judge for yourself ; I only spoke of expedience, and from a fear of irritating Mortimer.”

“ —How can he be irritated,” said Helen, “ by my coming hither if he were so anxious to prepare the cottage for my reception ?”

“ I repeat, dear Helen,” said the Countess, “ I have done. I think I might have been indiscreet in anticipating him in the pleasure he proposed to himself in showing you the place ; it remains entirely for you to adopt whatever course you think proper ; only acquit me of any unfair motives. I only say, I have known Mortimer longer than you have, and have hoped since I have been here to restore him to himself and you, from whom he seems to me so much estranged."

The conversation here subsided into a calm ; but Helen's heart was bursting. The Countess appeared at once to dismiss the whole affair from her mind ; and, after a kind of restless nervous walk, or rather saunter along the terrace, the ladies remounted the phaeton and returned to the " Hall," not much having been said on the road homeward by either, as to the adventure of the Fishing-House, or indeed anything else. What had been doing at Sadgrove during their absence we shall see hereafter.

LONDON :
PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

BIRTHS,
DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"SAYINGS & DOINGS;" "MAXWELL;" "JACK BRAG;"
&c.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

LONDON:
RICHARD BENTLEY, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

1839.

BIRTHS, DEATHS,

AND

MARRIAGES.

CHAPTER I.

It may naturally be supposed that Helen's feelings were not a little excited by the disclosure which had been made to her by her amiable friend during the morning; not that she was so much mortified by having become acquainted with a fact for the concealment of which from her knowledge there seemed to be no adequate cause, but because, being in possession of that, which for some reason or other Mortimer had chosen to make a secret, she felt that it would be impossible for her any longer to affect an ignorance of the existence of his favourite retreat; for, even if she endeavoured to conceal the knowledge she so innocently and unintentionally acquired was certain that it would, even with the constant exercise of watchfulness over her, which such a course of proceeding would demand, sooner or later "come out," as the children say. Helen had nothing like caution in her speech, and, even if she had, premeditated and continuous deception was not compatible with the openness of her heart and mind: the warnings of the Countess, who appeared to know Mortimer's character better than I did, weighed heavily upon her. — But Mortimer, it is true, had never told her of his retreat, but, never having mentioned it, allowed of course that he had not prohibited her visit to it; might it not be as the Countess said, that he purposed to surprise her by taking her thither himself? The probability that this was really his intention was strengthened by the fact that the woman in charge had been making alterations in the furniture; the suggestion of the Countess herself, who had accompanied Mortimer thither a few days before

This supposition pleased her, but the pleasure that it afforded was in some degree qualified by the recollection that the Countess had been Mortimer's companion on the occasion.

Helen felt the necessity of deciding, before her husband's return from Worcester, whether she should admit to him her having been at the cottage or not. If she did not tell him as soon as he arrived, or at least as soon as he inquired how the day had gone off in his absence, the time would be past for speaking of it. He could not be angry — he must have intended her to go to it at some time or other : besides, she had not sought it — she had been taken thither by his friend. It seemed so absurd to make a point of such a trifle—she would tell him ; —and yet,—a dread of something, what she scarcely knew, came over her and shook her honest resolution.

In the midst of these conflicting feelings she determined to avail herself of the advantage of her father's presence, to tell him the circumstances, and take his advice. Nothing pleased Batley more than being consulted; no matter ment of an affair, the more he was delighted inasmuch as it afforded him a better opportunity of exhibiting the adroitness of his policy. Of his advice might be said as Shakspeare says of Mercy,

“ It pleaseth him that gives and him that takes.”

Accordingly Helen rang the bell, determined to lay her case, which she had worked up to believe one of great importance, before her sire.

In this design she was, however, foiled inasmuch as it appeared from her maid's account, that, after due and diligent search for him, her father was not to be found. The delay which would arise before she could consult him was, however, rendered in

- - - - -

“Pappy” long before the subject of her anxiety could possibly come under discussion with her husband.

While therefore, Helen, as Carey says of Chrononhotonthologos, “Unfatigues herself with gentle slumbers,”

and prepares for her toilet, we will draw the attention of the reader to the occurrences which had taken place under the roof of Sadgrove during the fair lady’s involuntary “voyage” of discovery.

Batley having concluded his ride with the ladies, and having most gallantly assisted them in dismounting at the door, found himself left tête-à-tête with Lady Melanie; and somewhat exhilarated by the extremely kind and lively manner of the gentle Laura, thought it no bad opportunity of pressing his suit, certain from sundry indications, which a man of the world can never mistake, that he would be instantly accepted. Upon his established principle, however, he thought it as well to ascertain the views of the mother of his intended upon the point, as, if she should exhibit any symptoms of distaste for the union, he shape his attack upon Laura in a more ro manner, and win her over in opposition maternal mandate.

“My dear Lady Melanie,” said E
“you have no idea how happy I feel c ticated again in a family circle. The s deprivation of a mistress to my house by E marriage worried me sadly; and altho tried to laugh off my solitude by re friends round me, I found myself, aft little parties had broken up, even still gloomy than I was before they had beg rely upon it, that without the soothing, ing influence of female society, the world a blank.”

“With such opinions,” said Lady M “I wonder you do not again try your f in that most interesting lottery of life, mony.”

—“Ah!” said Jack, “there it is! I you that thought has long occupied my —and—only, to be sure, I am not young.”——

—“No,” said Lady Melanie, “nor very old, Mr. Batley. For my part, I think there is a much greater chance of rational happiness in a marriage at more matured years, than in one formed at a time of life when the mind is made up to expect perfection which never exists, and when jealousy and all sorts of worries agitate the heart and feelings, for no reason upon earth.”

—“Do you really think so?” said Jack, drawing his chair nearer to the sofa on which his companion was seated. “I am delighted to hear such opinions from a person of so much taste and judgment as your ladyship. Is it, do you think, likely that you might ever be induced to give a practical corroboration of these sentiments?”

“My dear Mr. Batley,” said her ladyship, evidently startled by the peculiar point and emphasis with which the question was asked, “what do you mean?”

“I mean,” said Batley, “if it should so occur that a man of about my time of life were to make such a proposition as you seem to think natural for a man in such a position as mine to make, would you act upon the principle you appear to advocate?"

"Why," said Lady Melanie, "agreeing in your original view of your own particular position, as you call it, I think I should."

"Then," said Batley with increasing animation, "you can and will make me the happiest man living."

Saying which, Batley seized her ladyship's hand and pressed it to his lips.

"Dear Mr. Batley!" said her Ladyship.

"Dear Lady Melanie," said Mr. Batley, "you must have been aware, I am sure, of the existence of a feeling of the tenderest nature on my part towards one in whom I have flattered myself I saw every quality combined to ensure my happiness. I hesitated, and doubted, more particularly as your opinions and feelings were so deeply concerned upon the point to which you have now particularly referred. You know the extent of my fortune; you are aware of the place I hold in society; my house and establishment are familiar to you; and it would ill suit a man of my time of life to say more than that as you seem to have anticipated my object, and are disposed to make me happy——”

“Why,” said Lady Melanie, “I confess I have sometimes thought I saw a disposition towards something of this sort, — but I doubted, — and” ——

“I felt that you were conscious,” said Jack, — “I rejoice to find you propitious; and I assure you, Lady Melanie, that if the most assiduous efforts to secure the happiness of a second wife, strengthened by the recollection of the excellence of a first, are likely to be successful, those you may rely upon: implicit devotion is my creed.”

“Really,” said Lady Melanie, “I——cannot——indeed the difficulty of answering — is” ——

“Of course,” said Batley. “If dear Laura should make any objections, — to those I am open: they may be overcome. In fact, I merely took the opportunity — the first I had — of throwing myself at your feet; — but if, however kind and gracious you are, and however ready you may be to listen to my petition, and even confirm my wishes, still, if Laura could in any degree,—I give you my honour, and like force must be used. If the gift be free gift, it is none ; so let it be left entirely her decision.”

“ I am sure,” said Lady Melanie, less sweeter than honey upon Jack, “ I am Mr. Batley, that Laura will not oppose mother upon this point ; —indeed,” added ladyship with a still more benignant “ Laura herself has anticipated this ; —certainly did not,—but I suppose, being more sensitive at her age, she saw the progress attachment of which I confess I was not ; I so much esteemed you, and was so pleased with your society and conversation that I easily fell into a constant association with you, certainly not prepared for such termination of it.”

“ Then,” said Batley, catching her again, and again kissing it, “ may I hope I fear is Laura’s—eh !—she may—”

“ May what ?” said Lady Melanie, “ you she herself first noticed your attentions”

she confided her suspicions to me ; — besides, Mr. Batley, even if she had any scruples, I promise you, as a child of mine she would very soon overcome them."

" Yes," said Batley, " but, my dear Lady Melanie, I would not for the world put her to such a trial. I agree entirely with you ; but still, if there should be any repugnance ?"

—" Repugnance !" said her ladyship ; " on the contrary, I do not think you do my girl justice. You should hear her talk of you in your absence : I do not — upon my word, I am not joking — I do not think that there is any dandy of the day — no — not the best of them, who stands so high in her estimation as yourself."

" Why," said Batley, " under the circumstances I hope not — eh ! — I should not like to play second fiddle to anybody. However, as I have already said, you have made me the happiest of men. — I may then, dear Lady Melanie, flatter myself " — and he again kissed her hand — " that you feel — in fact, you consider the matter settled."

“Why,” said Lady Melanie, drawing up, “I should think, Mr. Batley, that having permitted the affair to go thus far, you can have very little doubt upon that point. I assure you,” added her ladyship, “that my esteem, I may now call it, admiration of your character and talents is unbounded; and when I recollect, in addition to all my personal regard for you, the advantage which my daughter will unquestionably receive from the connexion, I am not ashamed to own the pleasure I feel in the result of this conversation.”

And Lady Melanie wept, and Jack Batley drew quite close to the sofa, and Lady Melanie leant her cheek against his shoulder and wept more.

“Calm yourself, dear Lady Melanie,” said Jack; “your emotion is natural. I can only say, that to secure the happiness of your daughter will be the object of my life: tell her not to fear that in my new character, as affecting her, she will ever experience anything like austeri-ty, or jealousy, or indeed anything but a tender devotion to her best interests, and that her feelings and yours will always be consulted by me upon every occasion and under all circumstances."

"You are a dear kind creature," said Lady Melanie to Jack, suiting the action to the word, and bestowing upon his sinister cheek a salute, chaste as Dian's, but which was evidently to be considered the seal of the compact.

"I confess," said Batley, "that it would complete my happiness to know that dear Laura——"

—"Rely upon it," said Lady Melanie, "I would not deceive you; I tell you she is prepared for all this: and as to her consent, of course if I ordered——"

—"Aye," said Jack, "but, as I have said, compulsion is not the course for me; —I——"

"Well then," said Lady Melanie, "I will put you at your ease, for I do believe you are a little fidgety; I will go and bring Laura here. I shall only keep you waiting while I take off my habit; and then you shall hear the meek, the beautiful, and dutiful submission of the young lady herself:—will that satisfy you?"

“ Perfectly,” said Jack ; “ satisfy is no word ; it will enrapture me.”

“ Calm your raptures, and wait,” said ladyship, who, in quitting the room, gave him a squeeze which presented to him a legacy of everything she had to give (in the character of his mother-in-law) to gentle Laura.

As the door closed, there arose a vision before the mind’s eye of the imaginative Batley. He never had doubted that Laura was his,—actually snared—trapped—bagged—but he certainly was not prepared for the ready acquiescence of her lady-mother. Men have strange notions about daughters and coronets and other mystical charms about in their sleeping or day dreams, with time and circumstances not unfrequently to be had. Laura was a blue,—odious, as we have seen, to Mortimer, but not odious to Mortimer’s father-in-law, in consideration of the certain “ appliances and means to boot,” by which he might, as an Amphytrion—for that was line — work his way into a position ready for political fight at the earliest opportunity.

It would be quite impossible to follow the fancies in which Batley indulged during the absence of his future belle-mère, — the scenes presented to his view, — the éclat of his marriage, — the sensation it would make, — the triumph he should enjoy over all the whiskered and unwhiskered dandies of London, in the possession of the rich Miss Thurston ; whence he descended into all the details of the marriage, carriage, &c., similar to those which had been exhibited on the morning of the Mortimeration of Helen, and thence into a disquisition as to the most suitable retirement for the honeymoon, and, in fact, into all the minutiæ of the most interesting ceremony that can possibly take place in the whole course of a man's life.

From this reverie he was aroused by the appearance of the gentle Laura, accompanied by her mother.

“ Here,” said Lady Melanie, throwing open the door, — “ here is the child herself.”

“ Dear Laura,” said Batley, catching her in his arms, “ this is too kind, too good of you.”

“ Not at all kind,” said Laura, “ not at all good. Don’t be cross with me, but as I love candour and truth I don’t mind, — I have expected this for the last month.”

“ Dear girl !” said Batley.

“ Mamma says,” said Laura, “ that you imagined that I should frown, and look angry, and say no, — dear me ! you ought to have found out by this time that whatever Mamma decides upon is immediately law with me.”

“ Angel !” said Batley.

“ I only wish,” said Laura, “ that you had spoken to me first ; for I own I should have liked to have been the bearer of the news to Mamma, so much do I know she esteems and regards you.”

“ Delicious girl !” said Batley.

“ Now,” said Lady Melanie, “ now you see how little you had to fear from any disinclination on her part ; I told you so, — no, no, Batley, rely upon it she never would run contre her mother's wishes."

"On the contrary," said Laura, "I do most sincerely assure you my wishes run ever before yours, and I am too delighted to see the result."

"Heaven bless you!" said Batley, catching Laura round the waist, and giving her one of those animated salutes which are perhaps not unnatural under such circumstances, but which young ladies sometimes hesitate to accept "before company."

"I beg pardon, Lady Melanie," said Jack, "I beg a thousand pardons, but one cannot always restrain his feelings. I am perhaps the happiest man in the world, and that must be my only excuse — it is a good one?"

"Perfectly good," said Lady Melanie, "and I am sure dear Laura will accept it."

Whereupon Laura looked down and simpered, and Jack delighted accordingly.

"Well," said Jack, in a soft under-tone, taking Laura's hand, "I have not been deceived in you,—your mother told me I should not be.”

“No,” said Laura, “I,—what can I say—I am but too happy.”

Whereupon John Batley, Esq., gave her another chaste salute.

“Oh dear, Mr. Batley!” said Laura, “you are really too good.”

“Not I!” said Batley, jumping up, twisting himself round in a pirouette; “but a momentary transport: I trust, I am, my dearest, we shall be the happiest of the happy.”

“But,” said Laura, laughingly, “you must not be so very civil to me. Mamma, I suppose, will not allow so much of your kindness bestowed upon me.”

“Your Mamma,” said Jack, “is the most amiable of her sex; and in confiding in the care of a treasure like you, convince my dearest Laura, of her just estimation and unceasing desire to make you happy.

“La!” said Miss Thurston, “I did not doubt it,—why should I? I have no dread of being tyrannized over;—no dread of temper, which I never saw ruffled, — no anticipation of scoldings,—not a bit of it. I am sure I can love you without one particle of fear mingling in the feeling to qualify its warmth.”

“Angel !” said Batley. “What a treasure you have given me, Lady Melanie, — to me, who have so recently lost the bright ornament of my house, my darling Helen.”

“I trust,” said Lady Melanie, “that all will be sunshine and smiles.”

“Can there be a doubt ?” said Jack, throwing his well-disciplined eyes so as to bear full upon the not-particularly beautiful face of Laura.

—“And,” added her ladyship, “I do hope, since I have acceded to a proposition of the sort, which I really think ‘the world’ will agree in considering nothing unreasonable, that Laura will make herself extremely happy under the new arrangement, and that we may all live together.”

“Nothing can be more agreeable to me,” said Jack. “I see no difficulty,—not a bit : Laura and I can make it out with the greatest satisfaction, and as for your living with us, nothing can be more comfortable."

"Ha, ha, ha!" said Lady Melanie, "what a droll creature you are!—in fact, it is your fun that makes me delight in you. I suppose you would not suggest that Laura should altogether engross the management of our house—No, my dear Mr. Batley, I assure you that nothing will give me greater satisfaction than proving to you how perfectly and entirely Laura shall be under your control."

"Nor will anything give me greater pleasure," said Laura, "than submitting myself most dutifully to so agreeable a father-in-law."

"Father-in-law!"—If Stonehenge had fallen upon his head all in a lump, Batley could not have been more completely smashed, squashed, annihilated, than he was by those words.—What did they mean?—what did Laura mean—what did Lady Melanie mean? "Father-in-law!"—the word rang in his ears. What was next to be done?—what to be said?—what could he do?—what was the next move?

— “ You could not have a better,” said Lady Melanie.

“ I know that, dear Mamma,” replied Laura ;
“ and it will not require much trouble to be obedient to such a parent.”

“ ’Gad,” said Jack, “ I — upon my life ! — eh ! — why — I — really — there seems — eh ! — I don’t know — I ” —— “ Do not doubt my allegiance,” said Laura.

“ I-do assure I will be as dutiful a daughter as if you were my own father, whom I scarce remember.”

“ Yes,” said Batley, “ but — the fact is — it is the most perplexing thing in the world ! — there is a mistake — a sort of — in fact — I never ” ——

“ No,” said Lady Melanie, “ there is no mistake. I always told you you would find her quite ready to join in my views upon this subject ; and that so far from any desire to thwart your plans or oppose your wishes, she would chime in directly with all your desires.”

“ Yes,” said Batley, “ but — really — this is — I — eh ! — I ” ——

“What is the matter?” said Lady Melancton — “Have I mistaken you? — What upon earth do you mean by this conduct?”

“I mean,” said Jack, — “I mean nothing, — only that — my object — my view — my intention was, — by Jove I — you see — I meant — that is — yes — I meant to propose for Laura.

“Ha, ha, ha!” screamed Laura, — “my poor dear Mamma! Why I, after all, am the object of Mr. Batley’s love and affection! Oh what a horrid discovery! What has been the cause of all this tracasserie?”

“I really do not know,” said Batley, — “but the fact is as Miss Thurston states — I admit the truth” —

“You do, Mr. Batley!” said Lady Melancton firing up; — “come then, Laura, let us leave the gentleman to his own reflections. I only regret that compassion for his melancholy position, as he described it himself, induced me listen to suggestions which I ought perhaps have crushed in the outset; but when he ventures to outrage me by making proposals to my child, he puts himself in a situation only be treated with the contempt which invariably follows folly and presumption. Come, Laura."

Laura obeyed, and on leaving the room, turned round to Batley, and, holding up her finger, burst into a fit of subdued laughter, and said sottó voce, "Oh, you vile deceiver!" The laugh resounded along the lobby after the door was closed, and Batley stood aghast like one exterminated.

It was quite clear that after this, Batley could not remain at Sadgrove; or at least that the Thurstons and he could not both continue their stay; and as it is an understood point, under such circumstances, that the ladies are to remain unmolested, and as if nothing had happened, it is equally clear that poor dear Batley must forthwith abscond — the which he did, leaving a note for Helen, stating that he was forced to start for town on particular business, and in such haste as not to be able even to take leave of her.

This note poor Helen, (who of course knew nothing of what had occurred about the Thurstons,) coupled with the absence of Mortimer and Magnus, began to consider a sign of some horrid embrangement of her husband and father at Worcester, or whither they might, in point of fact, have gone ; and it may easily be imagined, that when she met her guests at dinner she was in no particularly good humour for conversation or mirth.

The long-nosed little Count St. Alme took the presidential seat, and the gay people sat down ; but there was a gloom and dulness pervading the scene, which, although natural under all the circumstances, everybody felt to be particularly painful, without comprehending exactly why it was so.

The sensitiveness of poor Batley was such, that he could not endure the thought of submitting the details of his discomfiture to Helen so shortly after his expressed certainty of conquest, nor trust to her turn for ridicule, the rapport of the curious mistake into which Lady Melanie — “ the figure-head of the Fury ” — had fallen ; and thus, in the flurry of the moment, he sacrificed his unhappy daughter's peace of mind to a personal vanity, which, considering the relationship in which they stood to each other, he might upon such an occasion have moderated in her favour.

Ladies who are themselves charming, and who fancy that the men at table are not altogether disagreeable, feel no disinclination, especially in country-houses, to linger long before they “retire:” it is only your very modest, very foolish, or very vulgar person, who bestirs herself to get away from an intercourse which, in self-defence, every intellectual Englishwoman, for her own sake and for the sake of the male portion of her party, ought to prolong. In French society, the whole coterie rise together like a covey of partridges, and therefore it makes no great difference at what particular moment they go; but, with all our translations into English of foreign fashions, we shall be a long time before the national prejudice of sitting a little—not for any very long period—after dinner, subsequently to the departure of the bright stars of the firmament, is generally abandoned and abolished. We love to drink their healths when they are gone; we love to talk of them and all about them: — and then “ Bull ” must have his politics—politics must be the topic, after the ladies are gone, in every circle where nothing about the real state of politics happens to be known. Why men and women should separate after dinner for any lengthened period, certainly requires a solution; but as English custom has, time out of mind, made it law, all we can say is, that the longer the mistress of the house stays at table after dinner, the more benefit she does to society, and the more rational amusement she and her lady friends enjoy.

English people get sociable only round a dinner-table, (and any dinner-table, except a round one, we presume, is rarely seen in these days.) Strangers who (if a man is weak enough to be in time to witness its miseries) seem, in that melancholy stage of purgatorial dulness, the quarter of an hour before dinner, absolute monsters, if they chance to be strangers, become by half-past eight o'clock generally endurable, — sometimes pleasant; and only conceive, just as this sort of congenial feeling is coming over one, to catch the enquiring look of the lady of the house directed towards the leader of the throng, and see the whole bevy take their departure in long and melancholy array!

When you go to the drawing-rooms,—if you do,—the thing is all to be begun over again; it is a new field. Rely upon it, that nothing gives so much play to English society, high or low, as the aid of a dinner-table: it gets rid of an awkwardness with which the islanders are, more or less, universally affected; it puts them at their ease; and however cold and stiff the affair may be in the outset, it rarely happens but that before the dessert is put down, all is going well. The best proof of the truth of this axiom may be exhibited in the supposition of what the same twelve people—we mention twelve as an extreme number to be comfortable at a round table—would do, if it were possible to allow the said table suddenly to sink, like the cauldron of the Weird

Sisters, through the floor, and leave the ting round the outside edge of the circle it had just previously occupied.

It might, in some societies, be dangerous to perform this experiment too suddenly; but if done with due precaution, it would unquestionably produce on the convives a most extraordinary revolution of feeling.

On this particular day, Helen, who had protracted her stay at table whenever were present those from whose high or others from whose less abstruse but available knowledge of the world, she felt she could derive either information or amusement, hastened her departure. She noticed that Melanie, who had precedence, was fidgety and anxious to get away, and that Laura looked "extremely odd," during a discussion went on respecting the untoward departure of Batley; and Helen, who had last seen her father intimately associated with them, began to suspect that they knew something of the cause of his sudden departure, and that in some manner connected with Mortimer.

sence : all this again set her too active and imaginative mind wondering and weaving a web of mystery — and misery.

“ My dear child,” said the Countess St. Alme as they entered the drawing-room, “ you are worrying yourself to death about nothing. I know every turn of your thoughts ; you fancy something terrible is happening to Mortimer. Make up your mind to this sort of thing ; he will be home with his friend, long before we retire for the night.”

“ Yes,” said Helen, “ but it seems so strange that my father should have gone.”

“ Oh !” said Lady Melanie, “ don’t let that worry you.”

“ Oh, dear no !” said Laura, “ that needn’t trouble your mind. Ha, ha, ha !”

Whereupon Lady Mary something, who was a crony of Laura’s, re-echoed the laugh, which promised to be general but that, as Helen saw, it was immediately checked by the Countess.

This naturally set her wondering more. — What was the influence this presuming woman possessed, to regulate the degree of with which the visitors of Sadgrove chanced to visit the sudden departure of her much-loved parent?

It was quite clear to Helen, that what had happened during the course of the evening everybody in the house was better informed to the particulars than herself; and, certainly if the sensation of being, as the phrase is, "basketed," is never very agreeable, it must be doubly irksome and irritating when the "basketed" one, happens to be the mistress of the house in which the mystery exists.

The moment suspicion is allowed a foothold in the mind, "trifles light as air" continue to strengthen and encrease its power; and though it differs in its character from jealousy inasmuch as it arises from self-love and apprehension of some plan or scheme against the "patient" himself, the progress of the disorder is not very dissimilar. The delicacy and delicacy of Lady Melanie's position in the family, outraged, as she felt she had been, by the bad taste of the father of hostess, and the offended vanity of her daughter, piqued at what she considered his presumption, and subdued only by a sense of what was due to "the lady of the house," kept them both in a state of artificiality throughout the evening. They spoke but little; and when they did speak, their answers were evasive; and there was a nervousness in their manner, which Helen, never glancing at a rejection of her agreeable parent's offer, still attributed to a knowledge of something that was to occur, — perhaps was occurring, perhaps had occurred, — in which they knew Mortimer was engaged; for even when the ladies laughed, and when they had, jocosely as they evidently meant, begged her to dismiss all apprehension from her mind, the whole performance was undoubtedly an effort.

It would be difficult to describe the anxiety of poor Helen. Vain were the assurances of the Countess that the absence of her husband was in no degree connected with the disappearance of her father; for although, of course, neither Lady Melanie nor her daughter had dropped a hint of the contretemps of the morning, the Countess was not altogether uninformed of what had happened. The subtlety and activity of an accomplished French maid generally procured her all the secret intelligence connected with the society in which she mingled ; and upon the present occasion, although the particulars had not been so distinctly stated as they might have been, she was aware that an offer had been made and declined.

All these strangenesses and awkwardnesses went on : music was tried — it did not answer : the men joined the ladies, and one or two parties of Ecarté were formed ; but everything went on heavily until about eleven o'clock, when Mortimer, apparently in better spirits than usual, returned. Helen ran to receive him, and was not repulsed ; a kind of reproofing look, however, seemed intended to moderate her enthusiasm ; and as his eye glanced round the room, Helen saw it first fall on Lady Melanie and her daughter, and then rest significantly upon the countenance of Madame St. Alme.

“Your father has left us, I find,” said Mortimer, again looking towards the Thurstons.

“How did you hear that?” said Helen.

“He was himself the herald of the news,” said Mortimer. “He was changing horses at ‘The Hop-Poles’ as we were going into the house; we therefore detained him, and now he and Magnus are gone up to town together.”

“What in the world took him away in such a hurry?” said Helen.

A look from Francis, in which gravity, admonition, and a sort of comic expression of mock melancholy, were blended, astonished Helen.

“He has special business in London,” said Mortimer with another frown, which unfortunately was perceived by Miss Thurston, who was thus made aware of what she could scarcely have doubted under the circumstances, — namely, that Batley had communicated the whole of the scene of the forenoon to his friends Mortimer and Magnus. The young lady looked at her mother, but her ladyship affected to be too much engaged with Ecarté to hear what was going on.

“Well,” said Mortimer, “and how has it you made it out during my absence?”

“We rode in the morning,” said Mr. Thurston.

— “And,” said Lord Harry, “I and Henry we went fishing. We had no sport, but a most beautiful excursion. The view of Ebury grove from the other side of the river is quite charming; and, by the way, your boat-keeper pointed out to us one of its beauties of which we have hitherto lived in a state of ignorance unblest.”

“What may that be?” said Mortimer.

“One of the prettiest things in the world,” said Lord Harry, — “a fishing-temple.”

These words, simple and innocent enough in themselves, produced a most extraordinary effect upon several of the company. Mortimer coloured-up, and his lip quivered, and his eye unconsciously sought that of the Countess whose look, much to his surprise, as suddenly fell upon Helen.

“ Yes,” said Mortimer, “ it was a very pretty thing once, but it has got out of order.”

“ But does it belong to you ?” said Lady Mary.

“ Yes,” said Francis.

“ Then, Mr. Mortimer, we must go there,” said her ladyship, “ to-morrow ; — to-morrow, Mrs. Mortimer — have you never seen the Fishing-House ?”

“ No,” said Mortimer anticipating the answer, “ I did not wish her to see it until I had got it a little put to rights ; however, if to-morrow should be fine, we will send down our luncheon there, and go and bury ourselves in its sweet seclusion. I meant to surprise Helen, and to-morrow shall be the day.”

Accidentally, and by his own anxiety to account for his wife’s ignorance of this favoured spot, Mortimer had forced her into the very position in which no power on earth would have induced her to place herself. He had answered for her, that she had not seen it ; she knew she had : she knew that silence at that moment was falsehood, — and yet (not without a warn-

per. The moment was past when she could have said she had visited it. Now, what had she in view? — a struggle, falsehood and hypocrisy from that instant to the hour in which she first should see it him.

“What do you say, Lady Melanie,” Mortimer going to the Ecarté table, — “to-morrow suit you?”

“Why, my dear Mr. Mortimer,” said Melanie, “we must run away to-morrow. We have two or three visits to make, and—— — “My dear Lady Melanie,” said Harry, “going to leave us?”

“Oh, dear!” said Mrs. Mortimer.

“Oh! really we must,” said Laura. “I know mamma is expected at the Dumbell

“If you must,” said Mortimer, rather archly as Helen thought, “why there is an end; but we should be too happy if you would stay much, very much longer.”

“The more reason,” said Lady Mary, “for our going to the Fishing-House to-morrow: a change of scene will divert our thoughts from those who are gone.”

“Yes,” said Mortimer somewhat mournfully; and again Helen saw his look riveted on the Countess.

“Is it of any extent, Mortimer?” said Lord Harry.

“No,” replied Francis, “a mere summer-house: there are two or three rooms attached to it, and a kitchen, so you shall have your soup hot.”

“I am sure you will like it,” said the Countess to Helen, by way of effectually stopping what she fancied would be a declaration of their visit, ready to break from her lips.”

Helen said nothing, but shook her head mournfully and looked down.

“I am delighted,” said Mortimer, whose spirits seemed better than usual, excited perhaps by some adventitious exhilaration, or by the ride, or — no matter what ; at all events he appeared to enter into the projected excursion with warmth and interest. Whether, when the morning came, he might repent of the readiness with which he had fallen in with the wishes of his friends, was another affair. That he was pointedly kind and affectionate in his manner to Helen was unquestionable ; and it seemed to the Countess, that even that effort to unbend was part of his preparation for the visit of the morrow. His knowledge of all Batley's proceedings, which he had confided to him, but of which he perceived by her manner Helen was ignorant, had created a new interest ; and when the party separated for the night, there was but one aching heart in the whole collection, — and that was Helen's.

The moment had passed when the natural impulse of her artless mind, in which there were no secrets concealed, would have led to the plain, straightforward, ingenuous admission, or rather declaration, that she had been at this fishing-temple: it was impossible to recur to it; she was therefore, as we have just seen, destined to live on a feverish life through all the night and part of the following day; and when they retired to their room, and Francis gave her an animated description of her father's exploits and discomfiture, she listened without feeling absorbed in what else would naturally have awakened her warmest filial sympathies — the one sad thought still weighing upon her heart, that, trifling as the circumstance was, she had a concealment from her husband.

If such a person as Helen could have indulged in strong language, — and I am not sure but that, upon reasonable provocation, she might have done so, — it would be difficult to set down the terms in which she would have anathematized the fishing-temple, and the Countess who dragged her there. The night was one, to her, of horror and remorse: a thousand times she resolved to awaken Mortimer and tell him the truth, but as often was she checked by the fear of his anger, — a fear instilled into her mind by the hints and innuendoes of her dangerous friend the Countess.

Generally speaking, where that unreserved communication exists between men and their wives, without which all hope of domestic happiness is vain, the time of retirement from the "million" is the season of confidence: to this period, on all former occasions, Helen had looked forward for what, in her lively way of treating subjects, she used to call a "talk over" of the people and the incidents of the day; and it must be owned that she had the faculty of hitting off characters with a quickness and truth which stamped her mind as one which was calculated for greater things than those which in all probability were destined to occupy it.

Different, indeed, was the feeling which actuated her during this night. While in her dressing-room, instead of speaking good-naturedly or kindly to her maid as was her wont, all her thoughts were devoted to what she felt was a wrong she had done. The questions of her attendant, as to the arrangements of her dress for the morning, passed unnoticed ; and her manner was so strange and abstracted, that the poor soubrette began to fancy that she had done something to render herself obnoxious to her mistress's anger.

♦

It was not so ; Helen was not angry with the maid, but with herself ; and the remorse she felt for what she had been induced, rather to permit than do, preyed upon her with accumulated force from the dread she entertained of Mortimer's alluding to the conversation which had passed in the drawing-room.

Luckily for her, Mortimer did not revert to the subject after they retired for the night, the real truth being, that it was one which he could not well approach without admitting that he himself had visited the scene of his former seclusion without his wife and with her visitor. Thus both of these two persons were kept in an agony of apprehension lest either of them should allude to what — if their conduct towards each other had been regulated by the candour which alone ensures mutual happiness in married life — would have formed perhaps as innocent a topic of conversation as any upon which they might have chosen to discourse themselves to sleep.

Mortimer's feelings upon the point were of a totally different character from Helen's: in his anxiety to avoid the subject, there mingled recollections of crime and sorrow, and a consciousness of wilful deception towards his young bride — for the reader may be satisfied, that although the urbane and agreeable master of Sadgrove could not refuse to accede to the proposition of his guests to make a party to the Elysium which some of them had discovered, it had not been his intention, at all events so speedily, to familiarize Helen with its charms and beauties; and he lay trembling lest her questions about it might be such that he could not answer with a due regard to truth, without laying open more of his former habits, or of his reasons for not taking her there before, than he felt would be likely to encrease her affection or respect for him.

She, on the contrary, through the kind communicativeness of the Countess, was already apprised of all that he was most anxious to conceal from her; and that knowledge of past events, blended with the secret excursion of the morning, now evidently not to be revealed, made her miserable. Fortunately, however, owing to his expedition to Worcester, and the extra exbilaration of spirits, which we have before noticed, and which Helen, perhaps not injudiciously, attributed to the effects of wine, of which, ordinarily speaking, Mortimer never took more than ultra-dandy allowance; or perhaps, to the very anxiety of which we have spoken, Mortimer felt but little inclination to talk of anything, and fell into a profound sleep, after having enlightened Helen as to the real cause of her father's flight from the house, the colloquy terminating by her exclaiming—

“ Poor dear Pappy ! ”

The relief to her mind afforded by the certainty that Mortimer slept without reverting to the one dreaded subject, was great, — but she closed not her eyes; she lay thinking and considering how she should best arrange the party for the morrow. If she went with him, she could not act sufficiently well, to affect surprise as the beauties of the place gradually broke in upon her; and, if she were able to do so, she could not condescend to deny having been there before: no, — Francis should drive one of the ladies, — the Countess? — perhaps not, — some one — any one, and she, Helen herself, would ride: thus mingled in the group of horsemen and horsewomen, the conversation would be general, and Francis should go on first in the phaeton and receive them; and so deception was to follow deception, — for what? — to humour a whim of the Countess, of whom Helen had become as much afraid as her husband actually was.

For one moment we may be permitted to enquire why, or under what circumstances Mortimer ever sought to renew his acquaintance with that lady, or why he still endured an association with her, which evidently embittered his existence; — there must be something in it more than we have yet discovered.

has, we know, positively denied to his bosom friend, Magnus, the justice of his amiable sister's suspicions, or rather allegations, as to the nature and character of his early friendship for the lady for whose sake, it nevertheless appears, he has consented to relinquish that sister's friendship; for, although for some time after his return to Sadgrove, their correspondence continued, it had at the time of which we now speak ceased entirely. Time may perhaps enlighten us as to the real causes of Mortimer's conduct in this respect.

When morning, and breakfast came, Helen felt at ease. The preparations for the departure of the Thurstons, and the departure itself, would occupy the attention of the group until it was time to start on the expedition; and, now that the lady of the house was informed of the real cause of their evanishment, she saw at once the delicacy and propriety of their not longer remaining in the house of the daughter of the gentleman who, with all his dexterity and accomplishments, had made a shot so desperately bad, as to wound the vanity of the elder lady of the two without so much as scratching the heart of the younger one. She was accordingly unremitting in her attentions and civilities; and, when Lady Melanie's travelling chariot drew up to the door, the whole population of visitors escorted her ladyship and her daughter to the steps of the chariot, and waved their hats and handkerchiefs in gay adieux, until the going guests were out of sight; — all these tokens of friendship and esteem being returned by similar signals from the carriage windows.

“What a bore that woman is?” said Lord Harry, as the party were returning en masse to the morning room; “I think the way she talks up her dear Laura is something beyond the common run of things.”

“Oh, and Laura's harp!” said Lady Mary; “upon my word, it is the most awful affair imaginable.”

“I must confess,” said Mortimer, “that the incessant harmony becomes after a day or two rather overpowering.”

“Yes,” said Lord Harry, “and if one ventures to whisper even, the old lady looks daggers at the offender, while, as everybody knows, the only use of music is to give play and freedom to conversation."

"Somebody told me," said the Captain, "that Laura was going to be married."

"I doubt the fact," exclaimed Lady Mary: "first, I doubt there ever having been an offer; and, secondly, I doubt still more poor dear Laura's being able to say no if there had."

"Then," said the Countess, "you are mistaken."

"Well, Countess!" said Helen, "let us live in blissful ignorance; there are secrets in all families,—so—shall we think of making preparations for our departure?"

"If you please," said the Countess. "Pray, dear, did you read the description of the flower I talked to you about, in the 'Annual Register,' where there is a long account of it? I sent it by Hannam to your room."

"No," said Helen, "I have not had time to open the book, but I will when we come back from our trip."

“Now,” said the Countess, taking Helen aside, “be sure you do not betray by word or look the fact of your having visited the fishing cottage before. I know his temper; besides, you would involve me in a serious quarrel with him, for I know he never would forgive me for having taken you there, even if he overlooked your going with me.”

“Oh, Countess, Countess!” said Helen, “why did you take me there? why am I forced to play the hypocrite, when, if we had acted fairly, there could be no necessity whatever for deception? this sort of life will kill me.”

“In this world, dear,” said the Countess, “men of the world are to be met with their own weapons. Candour on one side is no match for duplicity on the other; however, don’t let us preach, but get ready.”

The laugh with which the Countess followed up this lively sally rang discordantly and inharmoniously in Helen’s ear. There are in the world countenances which, even in their playfulness, are demoniacal; and the smile which gleamed over this lady’s features was characterized, at least as Helen thought, by a triumphant satisfaction at having, as if inadvertently, inflicted a fresh wound.

Helen hurried to her boudoir, from the door of which she met Mortimer issuing; he was pale and agitated, and his looks betrayed a violent agitation of mind which alarmed her.

“ Good Heaven, Francis !” said she, “ what is the matter ?— what has happened ?”

“ Nothing, nothing,” said he with a tremulous voice, and a look more of sorrow than of anger ; “ it is natural,—but cruel : would to Heaven I hadn’t known it !”

“ Known what ?” said Helen.

“ Here, here, Helen !” said Francis, “ come in, come in,—we are observed—they are looking up at us from the hall,—let us have no scene, for mercy’s sake !—I will go in with you.”

Saying which, he re-entered the boudoir; and Helen, fancying of course that he had discovered the history of her visit to the Fishing-House, threw herself into a chair as pale as death, or as her husband, for he looked like a spectre.

“Helen,” said he, labouring under emotion, which he strove earnestly to master —
“Helen, you need not have let me see so anxiously you seek out my evil deeds, — greedily you swallow all that can be said against my character.”

“Francis!” said Helen, “what do you mean? — what have I done to deserve this? If I have been inadvertently led to do what which is either painful or unpleasant to me, to rely upon it, it has never been of my own will. I wish to know nothing more than what you think fit to trust me with; indeed, indeed, I do not.”

“Then,” said Mortimer, “why take no unequivocal steps to bring to your mind the evidence of my guilt?”

“What on earth do you mean?” again asked Helen, sobbing convulsively; “if I have done wrong, I ask your forgiveness.”

At this moment she had resolved, in spite of all the Countess’s persuasions and menaces, to confess the visit, and to state the truth, nothing but Mortimer’s own singular inter-tion the night before, would have stifled ; for to falsehood Helen's proud heart would never have stooped.

“ Hear me ! ” said she.

“ Be calm, be calm ! ” said Mortimer ; “ I am not angry, but I am wounded, deeply wounded ; the sight of this book curdled my blood, — nay, Helen, Helen, Helen, it drove me mad. To think that from the whole library open to your use, you should have selected this one particular volume, stung me to the quick ; in it you see me degraded and debased, reviled and insulted : even if it gratified you to read such a record of my faults, you might surely have concealed the proof of your disposition that way, from my sight.”

“ Of what book are you speaking, Francis ? ” said Helen, relieved from her first apprehensions, but bewildered by the new allegation.

“ This book, Helen,” answered he, taking from the table the volume of the “ Annual Register ” which the Countess had sent by her maid to Helen as containing a paper on botany, treating particularly and minutely of a then newly discovered flower, of which there were at the present time several varieties in her conservatory.

“ I have never opened it,” said Helen.

“ Why is it here ?” said Mortimer ; “ you know its contents ; you know that in its pages are printed and published to the world the particulars of that trial whence I came scathed and blasted in my reputation and character : there, in its pages, are recorded the savage philippics of the foul-mouthed highly-fee’d advocates paid to blacken my fame, and hold me up to hatred and contempt ; and this book is the single solitary one selected from thousands free for your special amusement and gratification !”

“ Oh, Francis, Francis !” sobbed Helen, “ think better of me : believe me—trust me—I repeat, and solemnly,—that I have never opened the book. The Countess sent it to me by her maid in order that I might read an account of a flower which”——

“ The Countess sent it you !” said Mortimer, his face flushing from deadly white to crimson ;

“ she sent it to you, and for the purpose of — not for the — eh ? ” —

“ For what I tell you, dearest,” said Helen.

“ Helen, Helen, my dearest girl ! ” said Mortimer, drawing her to his heart, “ I believe you. I see it — I see it all ; forgive me — forgive me, sweetest ! — The Countess sent it — Merciful Powers ! — say, Helen, — I am subject to these horrid fits of frenzy, — say, you forgive me.”

“ Forgive you, Francis ! ” said Helen ; “ what is there to forgive ? If I could have been guilty of such a meanness, if I could have harboured so base a feeling as that of which you thought me guilty, I should have deserved your bitterest curse : but no ; I have told you the truth.”

“ Of that I am sure, Helen,” said Mortimer, again pressing her to his heart : “ sure, you have no disguises from me ; why should you ? ”

Again the visit to the Fishing-House of yesterday, and the approaching one of to-day, flashed into her mind ; but now she dreaded to confess, lest her admission as to that, might weaken his confidence in the truth of what she had now told him.

“It is, indeed,” said Helen, “a singular accident by which the Countess”——

“Accident!” said Mortimer: “Helen, upon it that nothing our friend the Countess does is done by accident; she is a perfect woman of the world; — do not offend her by saying anything about this; read the paper to which she has pointed your attention, and send it back the book: I will trust you as to avoid those pages a perusal of which can do no harm, but which perhaps in the playfulness of her imagination she thought might do some mischief.”

Hearing Mortimer speak thus of the woman whom, in spite of herself, he had made like, and whom he had selected as her visitor at Sadgrove, the natural impulse of his heart would have been to have strengthened his avowed opinion of her motives by repeating all she had said of him to her; but his father's caution, added to that which Mortimer himself had given her not to offend her, left Helen silent.

“That will be best,” said Francis, calmed down to reason by the conviction of his young wife’s ingenuousness and truth; “take no notice of what has passed.”

“Take you the book, Francis,” said Helen; “carry it away, — take it out of my sight!”

“No, no,” said Mortimer, “I must not appear in the affair: you return it when you have read what she means you to read; or rather when you have not read what she really means you to read, but that which she says she means you to read. Come, Helen dear; these people are waiting for us: your eyes look red; do not come down till all traces of this sorrow are gone: I will keep them engaged till you are ready. You do forgive me, Helen?” added he.

“From my heart and soul!” exclaimed Helen with a warmth so genuine and sincere that Mortimer’s heart beat with pleasure and satisfaction that he was blessed with such an amiable and excellent wife.

He went down into the hall, and Helen rang for her maid; but, the more she thought of the brief storm just passed, the more she wondered at the influence which the Countess evidently possessed over Francis. That he knew her faults and vices, as Helen held them, it was evident; for he spoke of her conduct even in the very last affair as being full of design and duplicity,—“rely upon it, Helen, nothing ever happens with the Countess by accident.”

Helen was dressed, her habit was on; her fine countenance was filled with an expression somewhat more thoughtful than usual, but not the less beautiful for that. But, she descended the staircase with an air of ease, selon l'usage du monde, and by the time she had reached the bottom, the sunshine of her eyes resumed its brightness, and for the “world’s” sake Helen looked the happiest creature on earth.

While the arrangements were making for the departure of the merry party, Helen watched Mortimer’s movements with a degree of interest and curiosity which perhaps she had never before felt upon the opening of any similar excursion. Her dress proclaimed her intention of riding, for in this part of her design of avoiding a protracted piece of acting she persisted.

“What!” said Mortimer, as gaily as he could, “you are for riding, Helen? Who then goes with me in the phaeton?”

There was a brief pause, it was but brief; all the ladies were prepared for riding, except the Countess: “I suppose, my dear Countess, I am to have the happiness of your society?” said Mortimer.

The Countess gave a look of acquiescence, and said, “If I do not bore you.”

“Not particularly,” said Mortimer, with a look so full of kindness and regard that Helen shuddered as she saw it given; not because she was jealous; not because she wished to restrain the friendly feelings of her husband, or check their expression; but because the look itself, and the manner in which it was given and received, were all so totally at variance with the feelings Mortimer had so recently expressed with regard to the Countess. To be sure, his civility might be offered upon the principle which he strove to impress upon his wife, of not offending her. However, Helen determined not to think, but to be as gay as she could upon this, to her, important morning, made, in fact, important by a series of incidents in themselves of no importance whatever. Important, however, it eventually proved; and from its termination may be dated much of that through which the reader has to penetrate before he arrives at the final point of our narrative.

Lest, however, we should hurry him, or her, as the case may be, too rapidly to the Ultima Thule — the catastrophe — we will take the opportunity, while all these very gay and happy personages are tittuping along upon their sleek-skinned horses to the Paradise of Sadgrove, just to cast a look towards London, covered as it is with its brown blanket of atmosphere, which, at ten miles' distance, points it out as the region of sea-coal, if not, as generally said, of sin.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Batley encountered Mortimer at Worcester, his first intention—worldly—was not to say one syllable as to the real cause of his sudden flight from Sadgrove; but Mortimer and Magnus led him on to a full confession of the facts of the case, he being never the wiser as to what carried them to that city; for, however assiduous they were in finding out his little involvements and worries, they remained upon their own business as silent as Gog and Magog during the animated discussions which occasionally take place in the Guildhall of the City of London.

Whatever had been the occupation of the morning on which those two worthies, Mortimer and Magnus, had busied themselves, nothing transpired except the result, which was a resolution on the part of Magnus to start for London forthwith: that this had been either premeditated or reasonably anticipated, it was not difficult to discover, from the fact that Magnus's carriage had been sent to Worcester from Sadgrove with his servant in the morning under the pretence that, if the night should turn out wet, or they should be kept later than they intended, it would be so comfortable to have it there; a precaution rendered, however, somewhat suspicious by the fact that the imperial was filled with the gallant Colonel's clothes, while his dressing-case, pistol-case, writing-desk, and half a score packages of travelling comforts, were all stowed away within.

There was a mystery in all this, as indeed there seemed to be in everything connected with the family: nevertheless, Jack Batley, who was the readiest of men at availing himself of anything that was going, either for amusement or advantage, found his account in the proceeding; and therefore, although he might be supposed to be interested in what looked like a decisive movement on the part of the most intimate friend of his son-in-law, he asked no questions, but answered one which was put to him by Magnus, whether he should prefer a corner in his carriage to a hack chaise by himself; for as Batley had gone down to Sadgrove in Lady Melanie's roomy chariot, he had no conveyance at hand but a "yellow and two," or the stage-coach, in which he would most probably have deposited himself in the morning, if he had not fallen in with his son-in-law and his friend in the afternoon.

It is scarcely worth while to detail the conversation which the triumvirate enjoyed at "The Poles," as the house, in its own vicinage, is called: it is merely necessary to observe that Batley opened his whole heart to his companions; and that the three being, to a certain extent, elevated by a long sitting over tavern wine after an early dinner, he swore a great oath,—not profanely, for it was by some heathen god or goddess, no matter which,—that he would revenge himself upon the Thurstons by marrying the first pretty girl he could find in the humour to accept him; rich or poor, it should make no difference to him ; if not, he should feel himself dishonour disgraced : and in this extremely sapient lution this long-headed politician was supported by his son-in-law and his law's friend, who, although he did much, observed that nothing could completely obliterate the effect of a defeat speedy occurrence of a victory.

In this strain the three gentlemen continued to argue, until Magnus's carriage drove to the gateway according to order, he and his friends threw themselves into it, resolving to spend the evening at Oxford ; unless, tempted by the quiet and unassuming comforts of "White Hart" at Chipping-Norton, they were induced to sleep in that calm and comfortable town, of which horse-cloths are the commodity.

Whether this happened, or whether they reposed at "The Star," in other words, at the bright one, — or at "The Angel," now in a feather, — seems immaterial ; the certain fact is that they arrived in town the following noon, heartily sick of each other, — Magnus bored to death by the fluency of Batley, and Batley equally worn out by the pomposity of Magnus. They parted friends, which was something; and Jack, in spite of all his former repulses, — such is the instinctive force of nature, — resolved to go in the morning and tell his tale of sorrow to brother Jacob, certain in his own mind, however, of the sort of reception which he should meet with.

Jack went about his house a melancholy, miserable man; he looked at the empty rooms, dingy with London dust and smoke, and redolent of the indescribable vapour, if it may so be called, for which there can be found no suitable word except one, which is not inserted in any English dictionary, — frowst. It is peculiar to our great metropolis, and is produced upon furniture and in rooms by the eternal and incessant depositions of minute particles of filth upon every object exposed to the operation of what is usually called “the air,” and which is in itself a wonderful combination of filth, smoke, fog, gas, and various ing-houses, boiling-houses, &c. in combination constitute that sphere of which already notice and in which a certain million contrive to exist nevertheless standing.

Batley's house had been shut all this horror ; the remedy was the disease : and, after having breathed the air of Worcestershire for a few days, the smell of soot, carpets, and canvass-bags "frowsty," sickened his stomach. The desolate appearance of the room pained his heart. Jack, however, was a member of two or three clubs ; and having "The University" was the best place thither he repaired. meaning to .

every other place in society, bores; but no bores are so serious or so inevitable as club bores. To a man much in the world as Batley was, the hope and comfort of dining at a club is, that one may be left entirely to his own solitary cutlet and pint of wine, either, as Batley proposed to do, to read-up newspapers after a day or two's absence from town, or to think over matters peculiarly interesting to oneself.

No man, we presume, who has a house of his own and a tolerably large circle of acquaintance, dines at a club, except as a matter of convenience,—always excepting House-dinners and trials of skill in gastronomy. It should, therefore, be held, if he sit down to dine alone, that his object is to be alone,—to dine, and to go wherever his business or pleasure calls him; and no man should take the deciding step of inviting himself to dine with him, unasked, any more than he would in his own house. If the originally planted diner, begins the colloquy by an invitation to the next arrival, what can be better or more agreeable? but, as it appeared to Jack, the most active self-bidders, —the chair-placing offenders of themselves to the unhappy solitaire who desired of all things to dine alone, — were uniformly the greatest bores of the whole community.

“ If,” said Jack to himself upon the occasion to which we now refer, “ the rule in clubs were, that men should hold the little table at which one dines sacred, and that, until they were asked, they would not ‘ make one ’ at it, all would be well : in all other respects this club-house is my house in common with others ; but my little table is as much mine, individually and exclusively, as my larger table in Grosvenor Street. To-day I like to dine alone ; I am not in the humour to talk, or laugh, or drink, or eat, — and here I am by myself. If I want a companion, there are plenty to join me ; but till I say, ‘ Won’t you sit down ? ’ — ‘ Won’t you come and dine here ? ’ or use some such provocative, I do expect to find myself as much alone as if I were in my own dinner-parlour with the house-door intervening between me and the street.”

“ How do you do, Mr. Batley ? ” said a most respectable Fellow of Ma'dalene, drawing his chair to the table where the repulsed Lothario was sitting.

“How do you do, Doctor?” said Batley.

“Pray,” said the Doctor, “have you heard anything lately of poor Dick Dowbiggen?” — and then, turning away without waiting for an answer, added, “Waiter, bring my glass of negus here.”

Batley wished him in — his college, at least.

“No,” said Jack, “I haven't heard of him for some time.”

“He's going,” said the Doctor, “very fast; gout, — asthma, — and a touch of erysipelas: — why, you know, Batley, we can't last for ever. He must be about your standing, I think.”

“My standing!” said Batley, and all his hopes of matrimony rushed into his mind; “he is my senior by twenty years, Doctor.”

“Oh! perhaps so,” said Dr. Bottomly; “I may mistake; — but you were both at Ma'dalene together.”

“Ah!” said Batley, “but he was at least old enough to be my father. Why, he is a fellow when I was an under-graduate."

"Probably," said Dr. Bottomly; "but you were always old-looking of your age."

To Batley, with the curly wig, the uncommon stock, the extraordinary waistcoat, and the sort of coat he wore, this was a hateful observation.

"Waiter," said Jack, "my bill!"

"Are you going?" said the Doctor.

"Yes," said Jack; "I have an engagement at ten, and it wants only a quarter. I thought you were going yourself."

"No," said the Doctor, "no: I purpose having half an hour's chat with you about old times over my negus."

"I don't care much about old times," said Batley; "I always keep looking forward to the Doctor."

And then Batley went off in a strain which quite astonished the venerable fellow, and led him to suspect that his companion was altogether in the possession of his right senses after which exhibition of principles and nions, he disbursed his four shillings and sixpence for his cutlet and pint of sherry, and took leave of the snug corner in which he had ensconced himself to be quiet, but out of which he had been driven by the extraordinary good-nature and attention of his reverend and venerated friend.

Jack quitted the little club-house, the beau-idéal of prettiness, (in spite of its marble window-shutters and the equivocal door in the centre of its stair-case,) and scarcely could muster courage to go directly home; — and yet Crockford's was empty, and Brookes's torpid. — What was he to do?

What he did, — whether he went into the Haymarket play, or recreated himself in any other pursuit, — makes no difference to the reader, as far as our history is concerned: all he needs to know is, that at some period of the night he found himself with his head upon his pillow in his bed-room in Grosvenor Street, resolved to visit his brother Jacob in Lilypot Lane early the following day.

According to this predetermination, Jack had no sooner despatched the ordinary business of his morning than he betook himself to the city in order to consult Jacob; a course the more confidently adopted, inasmuch as he was intending upon that occasion to ask for nothing but that which every man, probably conscious of its value, is extremely liberal in giving — namely, his advice, — he thought he would meet with a somewhat more fraternal reception than he could have anticipated if he had been going on one of those numerous errands which he had so frequently proved unsuccessful.

In undertaking this expedition, Jack thought it proper to take the precaution which sensible Magnates of the West-end of the town take, the habit of adopting when they are forced to visit the dark dens and dungeons, filled with desks and drudges, in the obscurity of which are made the profits on which they display themselves in what they call the proper sphere of society, and accordingly he condescended himself in a hackney-coach; and having directed the driver to stop at the corner of Lilypot Lane, he hastily drew up the ca-glass of the crazy vehicle, and, throwing himself into one of its corners, began to arrange in his mind the materials for a dialogue with his eccentric relation.

Arrived at his destination, the excited Batley hurried to his brother's counting-house. King Charles on his steed at Charing-Cross, or King James on his pedestal in Privy Gardens, were not more certain fixtures than Jacob at his desk in Lilypot Lane, from nine in the morning until 'Change-time; except on Sundays or holidays, when he indulged himself in a walk to the "West-end," as he quaintly called it, or when any special business required his personal attention in those parts.

Upon the day in question there he was, poring over huge books, and files of letters, with as much earnestness and assiduity as if he were just beginning business, and had a host of ravenous relations to provide for after his death, instead of possessing one only traceable connexion in the person of his brother.

"Jacob," said John, pushing open the swing-door of the sanctum, "how d'ye do?"

want ?”

“ Nothing,” replied John hour’s talk with you.”

“ Oh, that ’s all,” said J.
spare half-an-hour now.”

“ Well,” asked John, “ w that pleasure ?”

“ Any time after four,” said

“ Where do you dine ?” ask ate brother.

“ At ‘ The Horn. ’ ”

“ May I join you ?” said Ja

“ If you choose,” said Jac share alike ; only the dinner w dare say, nor the hour — half tual: bit of fish plain boiled steak.”

ten minutes after four, and we'll go together, else I suppose you'll not be able to find your way."

"I will be punctual," said John; "but you don't enquire after Helen."

"I am afraid to ask," said Jacob; "I know what the answer will be some day, and, though it don't make any personal difference to me, anything wrong there might hurt my credit."

"Oh, there is nothing wrong, I assure you," said Jack; "Helen is well, and I trust as happy as she ought to be."

"Ah, that'll do," said Jacob; "now go, there's a good fellow; be punctual, for I shan't wait: and—here—Mr. Grub!"

"I am off," said Jack; "rely upon my being here to the minute."

"Umph!" muttered Jacob to himself, as he replaced his spectacles on his nose; "something in the wind—no man in this world does anything without a motive: why should he take a fancy to a four-o'clock chop if he didn't expect to get something by it?—Here, Mr. Grub!"

... having looked at h calculate how he could contr hours and a half he had t little consideration assured h plenty of modes in which t ration might be performed.
was upon the Tower, where his friends of the Guards were however, to use his own exp his tip, for those whom he kn whom he meant to have taken what they call, " gone to T therefore, he bent his steps house Quay, as one of the li speculative eye, one of the localities of the metropolis. I scene, he permitted himself t ward until he reached S. D time for him to retrace his steps to Lilypot Lane.

“Punctual!” said Jack, as he again made his appearance.

“Every man is punctual,” said Jacob, “when he wants anything.”

“I assure you,” said John, “I want nothing to-day but your society, and perhaps a little of your advice.”

“Advice!” said Jacob, “I never take advice; I’m not very likely to give it: however, if I do, it must be after I have dined: I hate conversation at dinner; I like to be jolly and have no talking. —Come, Mr. Grub! call Alexander to help me on with my great-coat; good folks are scarce, and the evenings in October sometimes set in sharpish. —D’ye hear?”

“Let me do it?” said Jack, suiting his action to the words.

“No,” said Jacob, “I pay Alexander for waiting on me: I know what it costs—and no favour: I hate to be beholden to anybody.”

Accordingly, Alexander, or, as he was called by Mr. Grub, Alick, performed the operation of great-coating his master, and, having carefully smoothed it down, presented his hat; a quarter of an hour being expended in preparing the merchant for the probable severity of the evening of a sunshiny day.

“Now then,” said the worthy man, “are not too fine to be seen walking with me here I am, ready and willing, and as good as a hunter; so come.—Alick! I shall be down at the old shop.”

Alick bowed obedience, and the boy sallied forth.

“You never were at ‘The Horn’?” said Jacob.

“No,” was the reply.

“I can’t think what carries you there to-day,” said Jacob.

“I have told you,” said John: “I have not seen you for some time, and I wish to have some talk with you.”

“Ah!” said Jacob, “all your fine business is blown, so now you can condescend to join me.”

When are you to be married? not that I care: I only ask."

"Why," said Jack, "it is upon that point I"—

"Oh, ah," interrupted the worthy citizen, "I thought it was something of that sort; why, is the matter with Miss—what's her name you told me all about?—is that off?"

"That is just what I wish to explain," said Jack.

"Ha, ha, ha!" said Jacob, "what a fellow you are—always finding mares' nests!—I have heard people say of a mad speculator that all his geese were swans; but, as for you, it's quite the reverse,—all your swans turn out to be geese."

"Why, there has been a little mistake," said Jack, obliged to bawl out his confidential communication in a voice of thunder to out-roar the noise of the carts, coaches, and all the other conveyances with which the streets were thronged.

"Mistake!" exclaimed his brother, "ha, ha! I never make mistakes; nobody need ~~make~~ make mistakes, if they will but take a little ~~trouble~~ trouble: I never pity anybody who makes mistake. Here, turn to the left; there, ~~keep~~ keep this side!"

And accordingly the relations diverged into Paul's Chain, and, descending towards the river, just as they had passed the end of Knight-Rider Street, Jacob called a "halt" to John, who was in advance; and at the moment found himself at the door of a tavern affording in external appearance little in the way of inducement to enter it, but which, nevertheless, was the chosen restaurant of his wealthy brother.

"Is this the place?" said John, evidently surprised at Jacob's selection.

"It is," said Jacob, "and a deuced good place too: there, go in; push open the green baize door — there. — I hope they have got a bit of fire, — October afternoons are chilly, eh? — they have, by Jingo! that's right: — all done for me; other people think it too hot, but what do I care for that? Well, well done, Thomas!— nice fire, eh? — dinner ready?”

“ In two minutes, sir,” said the waiter, placing a chair for John on one side of the table, standing in the corner between the window and the fire-place, Jacob’s seat being opposite and against the wall.

The look of dismay which overspread John’s countenance as he entered the small and somewhat dark apartment, relaxed into a more complacent expression as his eye glanced over the snowy whiteness of the table-cloth, the shining cleanliness of the plate, and the comfortable appearance of the arrangement altogether.

As the reader is already apprised of Mr. Jacob Batley’s aversion from conversation at dinner, we will pass over the history of the meal summarily: there was salmon au naturel, a broiled fowl with mushroom sauce, and a rump-steak; the sherry was good, the cooking good, to the full extent of its pretensions: and when Jack, who did not think it right in the “ world ” to drink port-wine, tasted one glass of Mr. L.'s favourite vintage, he sipped and sipped again, waiting for an opportunity to begin his interesting conversation with his brother until the four or five other diners had taken their departure, seeing that the coffee-room was too small to admit of any confidential intercourse without the certainty of being overheard.

The few visitors, however, were there habitually, and Jacob knew them all, and they all knew Jacob; and John Batley grew gradually to like them, inasmuch as each of these men, for whose intellect he began by having no respect, and for whose station he had no regard, exhibited in the course of the conversation which occurred after dinner, and which, from the circumscribed size of the apartment and the acquaintance of the parties became general, each after his own fashion and in his own particular line, knowledge and information which quite astonished the merely theoretical man of public business. Here, in this small unpretending room, was he associated with men whose innate talent and industry had honourably realized for themselves thousands upon thousands; and who were, each in his way, masters of subjects of which Batley had learned only to think superficially, and talk unknowingly, and he at last worked himself into the faith that there might be not only wealth and enterprise eastward of Temple Bar, but that there might be knowledge, and wisdom, and high gentlemanly feeling, stored in the darkest recesses of Lilypot Lane and Watling Street; added to all which, he admitted to himself there might be comfort at "The Horn" tavern, although the introduction of cigars after dinner (he being without a flowing robe to shield his clothes from the contaminating odour of the tobacco, or a "Grecian cap" to shelter his own hair from the influence of the smoke,) certainly staggered him. However, "nobody" was in town, and therefore "nobody" would be annoyed upon his return to his own proper sphere; and as he found Jacob in a good humour, he determined not to be betrayed into a bad one, upon the occasion of having, for the first time in his life, beheld his brother in a position in which he was looked to as somebody of importance by persons who, never expecting any favour or affection from him, did not care for, even if they saw through, the selfishness of his character and disposition, but who paid that regard to assiduity and industry crowned by success, which, in a great mercantile community, cannot fail to command attention and respect.

By nine o'clock the rest of the company had quitted the room, and John having in an "unworldly" manner suggested another bottle of port, Jacob objected point-blank thereunto, and proposed a glass of punch "in lieu thereof," to which proposition John, the younger brother, the verd antique, immediately assented, and drawing his chair towards the end of the table, and consequently nearer his relative and the fire, accordingly made preparations for opening his subject.

Thomas the waiter, who had never seen John Batley, and did not know in what degree of relationship he stood to the "constant customer of the house," felt an unaccountable jealousy of the ease and familiarity with which he thus placed himself in juxta-position with Jacob. An elderly gentleman, known to be rich, is uniformly surrounded by a certain clique of expectants : they call on him in the mornings ; they dine with him in the afternoons ; they sit with him in the evenings ; they do all his little biddings,—go of errands for him, buy him little sixpenny presents, affect the greatest assiduity in his service, shut doors that are left open behind him, pull down blinds that are left up before him, stir the fire for him, write letters for him, and, in short, fetch, carry, fawn, and cringe, like so many daggie-eared spaniels. Thomas the waiter was not, of course, admitted to a degree of familiarity which could entitle him to such gentlemanly subserviency ; but Thomas had a notion that Jacob would leave him something “ wery considerable ” when he died, and therefore it was, that Jacob’s fish was better in itself and better dressed, and Jacob’s rump-steak tenderer and more carefully cooked, than those of any other frequenter of “ The Horn.” This feeling was nursed and cuddled-up in the mind such extraordinary liberties with Mr. Batley, except, indeed, the extremely and placid manner in which Mr. Jacob seemed to admit them upon this supposition. Nothing is more diverting than the irritable anxiety upon such points the rich man, in his senses, does not appreciate the fulsome attentions that are paid him by people who care nothing in the world for what he is, but for what he has attempted exclusion of those who regard and respect him, but who abstain from leaning upon his kindness or upon his hospitality: — either of these two last attributes cannot in any degree of truth be made applicable to Jacob.

“ Oh !” said Jacob, “ about the mistake and the marriage ?”

“ Exactly so,” said John ; “ the story is brief, and you shall have it.”

And so he had ; but as we have been at Sadgrove, where Jacob had not been, and, as far as probability goes, is never likely to be, it shall not be repeated here : the blunder was a strange one—the result, as we know, decisive.

“ Well,” said Jacob, “ I never heard such a thing in my life. I know nothing about female hearts, and all the stuff you talk about ; but how the deuce you could go on with your fine talk to one woman—ha, ha, ha ! and make the other—ha, ha ! If I had done that !—no matter—no. I don’t know anything about it, — and don’t care ; but you”——

“ Don’t laugh at me !” said Jack ; “ for, whatever else I can endure, I can’t bear ridicule. I feel conscious that I have made myself absurd, and that ‘ the world ’ next season will have the whole story, and I sha’n’t be able to show my face. There is but one course ; nothing can save me but marrying

“ Umph !” said Jacob, stirring his with his spoon, and then sipping; “ that seem so unreasonable : on the contrary are afraid of being laughed at by what we call ‘ the world ’ — of St. George’s, I Square, and the surrounding streets, — that is the best plan : but it’s all work ; to have anybody to care about, is an infernal bore — eh ? — and the quarrels — eh ?”

“ That would be my affair,” said “ but I never shall forget the hyæna-like of that Laura Thurston, who, I give you word, was, or at least seemed to be, as me as ever woman of thirty could be of”

“ Thirty, was she ?” said Jacob.

“ I should think little less,” replied J

“ Oh !” said Jacob. “ Ah, well, that is something ; but, however, in course she is altogether out of the question now — eh ?”

“ Quite entirely,” said Jack.

“ Why,” said Jacob, sipping his delightful beverage, “ if you really have resolved upon marrying again, — and now it seems a matter of spite ”——

“ Yes, I confess, more pique than passion,” said Jack.

—“ Why not,” said Jacob meditatively, — “ why not turn your thoughts towards Mrs. Catling, that very pretty widow who dined once or twice with Helen and you in Grosvenor Street ; and who is — why, I cannot say, — so very much delighted with you ? ”

“ What ! that pretty creature,” said John, “ with those bright blue eyes and that lovely fair hair, up in the Regent’s Park ? ”

“ Don’t talk so loud,” said Jacob, “ waiters always listen ; and, as what you are praising so much, is not altogether in my regular line of business, it might do me harm if it were overheard : but,” added he, leaning over his tumbler to speak confidently to John, "she is —— you may rely upon it."

"She certainly is very handsome," said Jack, "and extremely lady-like. Her late husband was your greatest friend, — that's something; and she is of a good family, — and that's something more."

"Good family!" said Jacob, "if you will only step over to Bennett's Hill, not twenty yards from this door, the Heralds will give you such a history of her as will make your hair stand on end: — she is one of the two last of the noble race of Fitz-Flanneries of Mount Flannery, in Monaghanshire — quite the gentlewoman; — and as for what you call accomplishments, — she draws like a cart-horse, and sings like a tea-kettle, as the man says in the book."

"Now don't joke, brother," said Jack. "I remember thinking her extremely agreeable; — and — you see it would be such a triumph to marry off-hand after this contemptuous rejection, — and a handsome woman with property, too."

“Property!” said Jacob; “her late husband, Kit Catling, who made mints of money by madder, died of dropsy just eighteen months ago, and left me trustee, sole executor, and residuary legatee,—all, everything in my own hands,—more fool he!—but that’s nothing. I didn’t care a straw for him,—but so it is; it is of no use caring for anybody, it never does any good. His will, like his wife’s pedigree, is within a hundred yards of us—Prerogative Office, just round the corner;—arms one side, leg’s t’other—eh?—there’s a joke for you! Convenient neighbourhood—what?—I think she would be a capital match for you. I know, as I have told you, she likes you; I know she wants to be married; and I know she likes what you call, and what she considers, ‘the world.’”

“Has she a jointure or ——?” said Jack.

“Jointure!” replied Jacob; “seven hundred and fifty pounds per annum of her own for life, let her marry when she pleases; all snug—requires nothing on your part—pleasant addition to your income. Give her two hundred a year of her own cash by way of pin-money, and let her have the balance back again for jointure if she survives you : I can manage all that."

" Upon my life ! brother, this sounds well," said John.

" I think so, too," said Jacob.—" Thomas !"— (Thomas came.) — " Ditto punch."

Thomas " understood the call," and as speedily as possible re-appeared with two more glasses of " the same," which in Jacob's facetious manner he called " warming it up again."

" Well," said Jacob, apparently taking much greater interest in John's affairs than usual,—which John naturally attributed to the influence of the " drink," and which, moreover, made him deeply repent that he had not at an earlier period of his life more readily fallen in with the habits of his eccentric relative, whose liberality appeared to him to possess, in a great degree, the mercurial quality of expanding in proportion to the warmth of the atmosphere by which it was surrounded, — " well, now really — I am serious — I think Mrs. Kit Catling would suit uncommon well ; you would,

as I have said, have your life-interest in her seven hundred and fifty—short the pin-money.”

“ I recollect admiring her very much,” said John, warming with the subject.

“ She is a charming woman,” said Jacob : ‘ you ’ll be a happy man if you get her.”

—“ And you think there is a prepossession ?” said John.

“ She has told me as much,” said Jacob ; “ but, as I never meddle nor make in matters of that kind, I didn’t take the trouble to say anything about it : it is nothing to me, you know ; however, I tell you my mind.”

“ And I thank you sincerely,” said John.

—“ And I tell you what,” added Jacob, evidently excited by his potation, “ I ’ll do something for you unasked, — and I do it, Jack, because you didn’t come to see me to-day, merely because you wanted something, — I ’ll stump you down a thousand pounds the day you get her consent, just to give you a start. It is not for your sake so much as to show those women, the Thirstys, — what d’ye call ’em ? — people of ‘ the world,’ which I hate, —

‘ yes ’ to the bargain.”

“ My dear Jacob,” said John,— for, the first time in his later life he him by his Christian name, — “ I sufficiently thank you ! I am resolved seven hundred and fifty pounds a-year to my income will do all we want : . . sure she has that ? ”

“ I tell you I am sole executor,” and “ trustee, residuary legatee, and . . else, under the will. I told Kit that have anything to do with it if I have my own way : — no colleagues for me

“ Then,” said John, “ the sooner concluded the better, and a thousand thanks to you for your kindness ! ”

“ A thousand pounds, you mean

“Waiter !” said John, “bring the bill.”

“Put it all to my account,” said Jacob.

“No my dear brother, I —” said John.

“Will you allow me to do as I please?” replied Jacob; “it is my bill — you understand, Thomas.”

“Yes, sir,” said Thomas, and walked away admiring the extraordinary liberality of the millionaire in not making his brother pay some seven shillings and ninepence three-farthings as his share of “the reckoning.”

The brothers then left “The Horn,” and Jack was too delighted to accompany Jacob to Lilypot Lane, astounded at his warmth, and liberality reaching in its expanse from seven shillings and ninepence three-farthings to a thousand pounds; but as they walked, so the more earnestly did Jacob confirm his resolution as to the liberal gift of the latter sum, and the more fervently did John resolve to carry into effect the proposal which should ensure it.

Now, as to the facts of the case: — The Mrs. Catling in question was, as both brothers agreed, sufficiently pretty for all the purposes of this world ; a lady by birth, — a circumstance which weighed considerably with Jack, — being the youngest daughter of the youngest son of the first cousin of an Irish baron glorying in the name of Fitz-Flannery. To say that she married the late Mr. Christopher Catling, of Cateaton Street, for his money, would be to admit that she was mercenary as well as poor : but that she did, as she considered it, sacrifice herself for the advantage and comfort of her mother and sister, is not to be doubted ; inasmuch as Mr. Christopher Catling did not, either in person or mind, manners or accomplishments, possess any of those qualifications which were likely to engage the tender affections of a “ lady ” of gentle blood and modern education.

During the lifetime of her gentle help-met she remained secluded in his suburban residence in the neighbourhood of Highbury Barn, a villa with a brass-plate on the door, and a gas-lamp over it ; and, although her connexion with the Peerage was with difficulty ascertained, she was acknowledged in all the little parties of that neighbourhood as the lady to be taken out first.

Of Catling's family stump,—for tree it could scarcely be called, — nobody knew much, not even himself ; — nobody cared, — for, let him have been what he might, they all knew what he was, — an opulent, honest, good-natured man; and, as the tablet erected in Islington Church by his inconsolable widow remarks, “ as he lived respected, so he died lamented.” He had, however, been preceded to the grave by his wife's mother, Mrs. Fitz-Flannery; and, at his death, his widow and her sister, after a due attention to the rules of decency and decorum, removed from Highbury to the more genteel and genial region of the Regent's Park, where, on one of the various banks which constitute its neighbourhood, she and her companion, at the period to which we now allude, resided.

The extraordinary confidence with which the late Mr. Catling had honoured Jacob, and the complete control he had given him over his property, placed the widow in an extremely embarrassing position. During her husband's lifetime she regarded Jacob with a jealousy founded upon his evident power over her husband; a jealousy rendered not milder in its character by a suspicion that the old misanthrope, as she considered and called him, was securing Mr. Catling's confidence in him, by endeavouring to shake his confidence in her.

When she found herself a widow, left literally at the mercy of the man whom, to say the least, she could never bring herself to like, she grew peevish and nervous; and, not being blest with more than an average proportion of sense, she worried herself, and felt degraded at being obliged, in case her expenditure upon any extraordinary occasion happened to exceed her available resources, to apply to her trustee for an advance. The truth is, that the will of her husband was neither more nor less a memorial of his mistrust, than her tablet in Islington Church was a perpetuation of his merits and virtues: which of the two was the most sincere, we leave the reader to surmise.

It was in the second year of her widowhood that Jacob, (before the invasion of Grosvenor Street house by Mortimer had occurred,) the trustee and sole executor and residuary legatee, had asked Helen to invite Mrs. Catling and her sister to dinner. The long-oppressed lady seemed to breathe again, in the air of the Western part of London; and the party happening to be small and agreeable, and John in high spirits, she was delighted with Helen, with Batley, (wondering that two such men as he and Jacob could be brothers,) and with the society in general. She saw the manner in which John treated his daughter; she saw the affection and devotion of Helen to her father, and thence justly and naturally argued in favour of his kindness of temper and disposition, upon which alone such mutual feelings could be founded: and then she looked round her and thought what a remarkably nice establishment it was, and how very agreeable it would be to be mistress of it; especially when Helen, by marriage, should leave that mistress in the enjoyment of undivided control, to mix with that class of society to which, by birth, she herself really belonged, but from which, adverse circumstances, and her later connexions, had in a great degree excluded her.

Over these thoughts she brooded, and the fancy took strong hold of her ; but she had few opportunities of improving her acquaintance with Helen, or repeating her visits to the house, for she was not after Helen's heart ; and, when Mortimer came, the unqualified exile of uncle Jacob necessarily involved the exclusion of Mrs. Catling : nevertheless, it may be naturally inferred that, when Jacob mentioned her name to his brother as a " sure card " if he chose to play the game, he had been led to do so by what he had gathered in conversation with the lady herself, with whom he generally dined on Sundays, and by whom he was received with that equivocal hospitality which springs rather from fear than affection, and which is exhibited more in the hope of soothing than of satisfying the visiter.

" What can this mean ? " said Mrs. Catling to her sister Margaret Fitz-Flannery, as she came into the breakfast-parlour of Shamrock Cottage, No. 120, South Bank, Regent's Park, the morning after the fraternal dinner at "The Horn;" "old Batley has sent to invite himself to dine here to-day."

"La, T'resa!" replied Margaret, "you don't say so! — what d'ye mean to do? not let him come, I hope."

"How upon earth can I avoid it?" said Teresa, "it is not wise in me to offend him — and, — it's exceedingly worrying; — Sundays I bargain for, and there is only one Sunday in a week, and one knows the worst; but here"——

"Oh!" interrupted Margaret, "send word we are engaged."

"But, my dear child," replied Mrs. Catling, "he will know that we are not; our visiting list is not so long as one of our visiting tickets, and he knows the name and residence of every one of the half-dozen select acquaintance we really happen to have. No, — come he must; and perhaps you will not be so violent in your objections when you hear that he proposes to bring a friend with him."

ing," said Margaret ; " can you guess who

" No," said Mrs. Catling, " but he put friend' — a gentleman who is very desirous improving his acquaintance with you."

" I'd lay my life," said Margaret, " either Mr. Grub, his head-clerk, or else young Haddock, the alderman's nephew."

" Well, there's one comfort," said the mistress of the house ; " Grub, or Haddock, or anybody else, will be better than having all alone by himself."

" What is this postscript ?" said Margaret, turning over the note ; " did you see this

" No," replied Mrs. Catling, taking the note from her sister ; " which ?"

" ' P. S. — Tripe is just coming in ; some for dinner. Let the cook wash it t “Onions!” cried Teresa.

“I hate tripe,” said Margaret.

“And I can’t endure onions,” said Teresa;
“and he knows it.”

“That makes no difference in the world to him,” said Margaret.

“No; self, self predominates,” said Teresa,
“from objects of the greatest importance down to things of the smallest consequence. If, however, tripe is to be had, it must be got: whoever he brings will of course know his ways; besides, he will not fail to boast of his authority in controlling my table, so that at all events we shall not be blamed by the stranger for being the projectors of such a dish.”

Having, therefore, soothed their excited feelings, and moderated the anger which the proposed indelicacy of having his favourite dainty had induced, Teresa wrote a kind and endearing note, expressing her delight that “dear Mr. Batley” was so kind and good-natured as to favour them with his company, and that they should be charmed to receive any friend of his; and begging him to come as soon as he regards, and Teresa subscribing her faithful and sincere; and all this was on a sheet of pale pink note-paper, red musk, and then folded and poked into coloured envelope with an embossed shamrocks, and closed with the impress seal on which was engraven a funeral cypress twisting over it: and all this directed to "Jacob Batley, Esq. Lilypot and consigned to the custody of the man" who had brought his letter, and they proceeded to consider and wonder what stranger would turn out to be.

As for Mr. John Batley, as was known whenever he started a new object, his heart and soul were in the pursuit. His vivid imagination which would have notice, to build castles of the most fanciful order and character : he saw domestic comfort restored to his house ; he should exhibit his fair wife to “ the world,” a triumphant practical refutation of any gossip which might get abroad as to his recent defeat ; and then it would be such a delightful thing for Helen to have so nice a person to associate with at Sadgrove, — one so much preferable to Madame St. Alme ; totally forgetting in the hurry of the moment that Helen had been more than ordinarily severe upon the widow Catling, and that he himself had been compelled to admit that, however lavish Nature had been in giving her personal beauty, she had not been equally attentive to her mental qualifications.

It was nearly one o'clock before Jack received Mrs. Catling's answer to his brother's note ; for, in order to save time and trouble to the messenger, Jacob had directed his “ young man,” Alick, to take the lady's reply direct to Grosvenor Street, so that John might be informed of the order of proceeding, and whether the ladies would receive them. He envelope staggered him : he proceeded, ever, to break the melancholy seal. W beheld the pink note itself, musky as it v ——“ and smelt it so,”

his heart failed him, —and who can won a pink note enveloped in a yellow cover an embossed border, and sealed with coloured wax, —all contrived to announce the tripe should be cooked according to and smothered with onions.

Now, abstractedly and in point of fact are few things so good as this particular and nobody was more ready to subscribe excellence than Jack Batley, when he of “ the world,” from which it is at proscribed : but not being aware that thy brother had made his conditions, or elegant" medium. However, his resolve was taken; the note was transmitted to Jacob in one of his own, announcing that he should be ready, whenever his brother called, to accompany him to Shamrock Cottage.

That Jacob did call, and that the brothers did go, we shall in due time be informed; but as some little time must elapse, even supposing Jack's suit successful and the widow willing, before the affair can be concluded, it may not be amiss to draw the reader's attention from the anticipations of the ardent aspirant for the lady's favour, — of the happiness which he was destined to prove in his second marriage, — to a retrospect of what occurred at Sadgrove since he left it, or rather after the departure of the party from the Hall to the Fishing-House.

CHAPTER IV.

THE day was delightful ; everybody seemed in high spirits—most of the party were ; those who were not, assumed a gaiety suited to the occasion. To Helen, the sight of Mortimer driving the Countess in the phaeton was blissful, compared with what her own position would have been had she been in the Countess's place. It happened, during their progress, neither of them asked who were on either side of Mrs. Mortimer one single question about the Fishing-Hole, which, however important to everybody, was the cause of their having an agreeable ride and a pleasant luncheon after it, nobody, save except three of the party, cared one farthing for.

the geologist, the naturalist, or the antiquarian may delight in the research, the idlers run their eyes over a ridge of rocks, a tract of country, or a heap of ruins, merely as the accessories, if not the immediate cause, of an agreeable excursion. In fact, the conversation near the "lady of the house" turned chiefly upon the merits, or rather demerits, of the departed Thurstons; it being a remarkable fact,—or one might perhaps better say, a fact worthy of remark,—that, whether it be in public or private life, the fluency of vituperation against any individual object becomes infinitely more powerful,—playful perhaps it might be thought amongst what Mrs. Trollope calls "La Haute Voleé," — the moment that the absence of the parties implicated is ascertained to be perfectly certain and likely to be permanent.

One thing contributed to relieve Helen's mind almost unconsciously, — the absence of Colonel Magnus. There was something in his manner, and in the distant coldness of his behaviour towards her, which his friends—the probable Helen ever would arrive at to tain its true character: and moreover beyond this, Helen had taken into her head erroneously perhaps, — that Mortimer had pointed his trusty friend to the office of guardian-dragon of his Worcestershire perides; in fact, that the fearful conscience of his own demerits, and the natural suspicion of his character, had induced him to involve his high-minded friend with the chivalrous character of domestic spy.

If Helen could have satisfied herself that this were really the case, it is impossible to guess what consequent course she might have taken; for, generally speaking, that surveillance is sure to lead directly to the which it is meant to avert. Nothing eventually justify your suspicions. The absence of Magnus was therefore, as has already been observed, a relief to her mind, she scarcely knew why; and accordingly she laughed and talked gaily and merrily as they wended their way to the beautiful bower.

The conversation being all pure "London," nobody paused to exclaim as the beauties of the scenery burst upon the view of the lively party, and Helen was consequently spared the necessity of acting novice: indeed, little was said at all germane to the matter till they arrived at the entrance of the temple, on the steps of which stood Mortimer and the Countess waiting to receive the "company."

"Well, Helen dear," said Mortimer, addressing himself specially to his wife, "what do you think of this snugger?"

"What I have seen of it," said Helen, "is quite charming."

"Come this way then," said the animated husband, who seemed resolved to make an effort to be unusually gay and cheerful; "I think I shall surprise you."

through which the Severn rippled by and which was skirted in the back-ground the Malverns. The deepening tints of had already beautifully varied the foliage as the fresh breeze blew on Helen's cheek, she pressed the arm on which leaning, and said half unconsciously, indeed lovely."

"I knew you would like it," said Mr.
and turning to the Countess, who was behind them, added, "I told you, Countess, that Helen would be pleased."

"I never had a doubt of it," replied lady, with a manner and in a tone which evidently meant to imply something, Helen could not exactly divine.

"Isn't it charming, Mrs. Mortimer successful manner in which they were deceiving her husband.

Helen seemed to shrink within herself at the sight of this odious look, which, although not understood by Mortimer, was neither unseen nor unfelt by him. It had just the effect of curdling all the suavity which he seemed to have stored up for use on this particular occasion. Its meaning was as mysterious to Mortimer as the Countess's previous glance at him had been to Helen: but it evidently had a meaning; and the little, little doubt which it engendered so completely counterbalanced all his hopes of temporary happiness, that he seemed at once to fall back into the morbid melancholy by which he was so frequently oppressed.

This tone once given to his mind, his memory recurred to all that had happened in the same scene years before. The bright expectation, that, by again familiarizing himself with his once favourite retreat with Helen, he might again enjoy its beauties, blest with the possession of a being as much devoted to him as she had been who in other days had shared its charms and its pleasures, faded in an instant. Either Helen did not like the place, or, liking it, had been prepossessed unfavourably against it by the Countess, — which he thought most probable, — or, — it mattered not what the alternative was, — there was something hidden under the surface, and his peace of mind was gone for that day. Sure it is, as the vulgar man fancies that everybody who laughs in company is laughing at him, the guilty man fears in every look, and every observation, however vague the one, or general the other, an allusion to his own particular case. Mortimer turned from his wife and the Countess, and with a deep sigh, which he did not mean Helen to overhear, joined the group at the other window, at which Lady Mary, who was so nearsighted as not to know her husband three feet off, was descanting largely and diffusely upon the delightful distant view which the fishing-temple commanded.

“ Surely, Countess,” said Helen, “ Mortimer isn’t well ! ”

“ Oh,” said the Countess, “ nothing—don’t mind him ; he is only thinking of other days : that willow which now overhangs the bank so gracefully was planted by poor Amelia. I dare say something struck him, — don’t think anything about it ; nothing makes him worse than taking any notice or making any remark.”

“ I almost wish we hadn’t come,” said Helen.

“ Oh, never mind,” said the Countess St. Alme ; “ sooner or later you must have come, and never could there be a better time than when we have a merry party here.”

“ Yes,” said Helen ; “ but if Francis is sad, their mirth is no pleasure to me.”

“ Oh, it will all blow over,” replied the Countess : “ my delight is, how admirably you acted your surprise at the prettiness of the place.”

“ Oh, Countess, Countess !” said Helen, pushing gently past her, and going towards the group where Mortimer was, but looking at her at the moment as if she had stabbed her through the heart.

“ Good God !” thought Helen, “ what is the spell this woman has over me? — w the influence? Why am I made to d my husband without the least cause or r Why am I driven to embitter the mome one to whose happiness my whole soul voted? — This must be conquered.”

The moment Helen joined Lady M coterie, Mortimer left it on a pretence of ing Captain Harvey a particular sort of which he had built for his fishing excu but it was evident to Helen that her ap had been the signal for his departure. S a sort of wild determination to follow hi seemed as if she were to lose him for ever did not make an exertion at that mo if she admitted for once the possibility presence being repulsive, she admitted al could render her miserable for life. Hel swam; she felt her cheek flushed, and se for the moment, imbued with a giant's str and resolution.

“Come, Lady Mary,” said she, “let and see this famous boat, too; why shoul men have it all their own way?”

This was said with apparent gaiety, and followed by a laugh, in which, alas! there was no mirth. Lady Mary, who took things as they came, thought Helen had some reason for wishing to see the boat, about which her ladyship cared no more than she did for its hospitable owner; and accordingly, taking the arm that Helen offered, they “trotted off,” to use her ladyship’s own expression, to the boat-house where this wonderful bark was resting.

The Countess saw this movement; and having, what the world calls, “all her eyes about her,” she saw also that she had wounded Helen’s feelings, and that Helen really cared for Francis a great deal more than she at first thought she did: this, for some yet undiscovered reason, rendered the unhappy Helen — for such she seemed destined to be — more hateful to her than she was before; and, while the anxious wife was gone on a journey of love to her captious husband, her charming friend was calculating the means of undoing all the and chided her jestingly for her fear of him.

“ I assure you, dear Francis,” said Helen, “ I was wondering whither you had flown to-day ; and, as everybody seems reluctant to approach ; and, as everybody seems reluctant to luncheon, I enlisted Lady Mary to be my aid in overtaking and apprehending you.”

“ I am sure, dear, it is very flattering to be so hunted,” said Francis. “ Where is your friend, the Countess ?”

“ My friend !” said Helen in a tone that which she usually adopted when speaking of her intimate associates, — “ your friend, Francis.”

The sunshine of his countenance was gone in an instant ; a frown again contracted the fisherman from the particular construction of his vessel.

“Why, my dear,” said Lady Mary in a sort of whisper, “what sharp lectures you can give in a few words!”

“How?” said Helen.

“I mean, the way you snubbed your husband about his friend the Countess,” said Lady Mary.

“I—I snub!” said Helen; “my dear Lady Mary, I assure you I am not at all a lecturer. I merely said what was true: Francis introduced me to the Count and Countess, and they are his friends, not mine.”

“Yes,” said Lady Mary, “that’s all very true; only——Did you ever see young Blockford, her son?”

“Yes,” said Helen, “he has been staying here: those two drawings I showed you in my boudoir were done by him.”

“Yes, I know,” said Lady Mary; “but I did not know whether you had seen him: that’s all. I —— Oh! here she comes.”

— And so she did come, accompanied by to have a meaning, and some-natured meaning too, as regarded the Countess, whom Lady Mary hated most cordially

“Dearest Countess,” said Lady Mary, “you come to bear witness to this pretty grimace of love? Helen has been husband hunting.”

“I hope,” said the Countess, “she caught her dear, for we are all starving.”

“Yes,” said Helen in a subdued tone, and which she somehow felt she could not lower her voice; “he is coming, I believe.”

“Well,” said the Countess, “as you are here, we need not wait for him: so, come with us rally; I think we shall all be the better for something to eat.”

—“And a leetle to drink of de champagne,” said the Countess, which was all he said.

“ I ’ll go and fetch him,” said the Countess ; and, suiting the action to the word, she proceeded to the boat-house.

Helen felt a chill run through her veins as this was said and done : but what her feelings were cannot be described, when, upon raising her eyes from the ground, she beheld those of Lady Mary fixed upon her, with an expression of surprise at the free and easy manner of her friend, and of the quiet way in which Helen seemed to endure her domination.

All Lady Mary said was, “ Well ! ”—but her looks conveyed an idea that she thought a great deal more.

Strange to say, however much worried, however much excited, however much vexed by the Countess, Helen never before had entertained the slightest suspicion of that which, for her misery, at this moment flashed into her mind. It was clear as light ; Lady Mary, a woman of “ the world,” was aware of it : Helen was looked upon by her own guests as a victim, — as a duped, deceived wife, — and the Countess was — But was it probable, was it possible, that in the first month of his marriage with her he should seek not only to renew an old acquaintance with this woman, but bring her into the society and into a constant association with his young wife? The thing would not be believed even in a novel; and yet —.

And then came the collecting in her mind the ten thousand nothings, — the

“Trifles light as air,”—

which had occurred during the Countess's domestication at Sadgrove; — the circumstance of the visit to this very fishing-temple: — but no, no, — it must be calumny, — it must be the jealousy which women cannot repress — the envy they cannot control: — and yet, why should Lady Mary be envious of the Countess St. Alme? Still, the look she gave! — and then the manner of the men who were staying there, while addressing her! — there seemed to be an ease, an almost boldness of familiarity, in their conduct towards her, totally different from that which they observed towards herself, or Lady Mary, or any other of the visitors. And then, the rooted hatred of Mortimer's sister for her, — for of this she was made aware by the necessity Mortimer felt for giving some strong reason why Mrs. Farnham refused to join the Sadgrove party : — in fact, all in one moment were conjured up, by the glance of Lady Mary's bright blue eyes, visions innumerable, doubts, suspicions, dreads, and alarms, to which Helen's mind had yet been a stranger.

Helen's spirit was a proud one : she would bear with patience and with perseverance all the ills and sorrows of mortal life to serve, to soothe, to save the being she loved : nay, marrying Mortimer as she did, with a knowledge of his character, and of the follies, and even vices, of his earlier life, she was prepared to make allowances, and to look over with kindness and consideration whatever circumstances connected with his former marriage might militate against their perfect happiness ; but, the moment she fancied that she was made a dupe of, and that “ the world ” pitied her blindness or meanness in enduring a rival near the throne, all other feelings sank into shade.

deception meant, to conceal from him that she was devoted the dreadful thought had been created in her mind? How she bear to look upon the Countess? to see her the usual companion of her husband? And yet, so did it happen, she turned from Lady Mary, and while that has been written was flashing, lightning like, through her brain, she saw the Countess gaily approaching them, leaning on Mr. Montague's arm.

Whether Lady Mary saw how her husband was told, or not, one cannot ascertain : she continued to follow it up in the most skilful manner saying, with all the carelessness imaginable

“ Well, dear, although you went to hunt your husband, the Countess has brush away a tear : “ let us be revenged, Lady Mary, and leave them to follow us.”

Lady Mary was as much a woman of the world in her way as the Countess was in hers, and duly appreciated this forced piece of gaiety on the part of Helen ; however, as she had carried her point, and done her duty by enlightening her fair hostess, she, of course, entered into the little divertisement with the greatest alacrity.

The luncheon served, the soup, according to the terms of the treaty, hot, the champagne cold, the party seated, the windows closed, and the snug circle formed, everybody seemed at home. All the sight-seeing part of the morning being past, the refreshment after labour, which is alike essential to free-masons and those of the “ profane,” seemed to put everybody in good-humour, excepting two persons, by whom was all the gaiety provided. Mortimer and Helen were the only two who were compelled to act a part ; they were both wretched : Mortimer, for a thousand reasons connected with the present and the past ; and been already, to a certain extent, sh

What position could be more p that of this man and wife? Devot other, if their feelings and affections allowed fair play, they were, wi slightest reason, estranged from ea and here were two hearts, in which the seeds of mutual love, throbbin hour of gaiety with pain, with doubt, with jealousy.

It is said, that it is "better to end of a feast than at the begin 'fray;" now, as Sterne says, "Tha Nothing is more agreeable to the ey gay brightness of a dejeuner à la like this of Mortimer's: look at it "hour is past," the ruins by no me

ners,) has been gratified, — the mutilated jellies, the abandoned legs of fowls, the scattered lobster salad, the desolated piles of prawns, and all the rest of it. Things had arrived at this point, and the listlessness of the flushed guests manifested itself by their rising from table, and beginning to feel chilly, and talking about the horses and the carriages and going back again. There it is, — all pleasure must end in this sublunary world ; and accordingly orders were given for making preparations for the departure.

“ I cannot go,” said the Countess, “ without seeing my poor dear nice old woman. Here, sir,” continued this most amiable of her sex, speaking to one of the footmen, “ go, and send Willis’s old woman here,—the guardian nymph, as I call her, of the fishing-temple.”

“ Poor old soul !” said Mortimer ; “ I really believe that she is as proud of her post here as a governor-general is at Calcutta : she takes a delight in the place.”

—“ And,” whispered the Countess, “ Amelia gave her the office.”

in what might be called friendly repel the remark by motioning th from him.

Helen, not daunted by the fe which circumstances had inspired her husband and his friend, who, v ning inherent in her nature, had, du past, felt that something had occurre Helen's views of her position in circle, and who seemed proportionall resolved upon mischief. It would b to notice how many glasses of chan drank at luncheon, but there seeme her air and manner a restless anxiety thing to happen at this particular for which Helen, who noticed her could not account.

THE END

do you get on? You are one of those evergreens upon which time and seasons have no effect. Are you comfortable and happy?"

"Yes, sir," said the old woman; "quite so, thank you, sir. I hope, ladies, you are quite well," added the grateful rustic, addressing Mrs. Mortimer and the Countess.

"Quite well, thank you," was the answer of both.

"Here, my good woman," said Mortimer, slipping a sovereign into the wood-like palm of her shrivelled hand; "you must not forget the day of our first visit to the Fishing-House."

"Thank you, sir, thank you," said she, dropping a curtsy, from which it appeared somewhat improbable that she would ever recover. "I hope, ma'am," added she, addressing Helen, "you like the way I had those muslin curtains put up: I could not get the man to send home the pink ones which you told me to get cleaned."

Helen felt as if she should sink into the earth. Mortimer looked astounded.

"Why," said he, "what are you talking

I never dream till I go to sleep, and that now. My lady there ordered n the curtains which used to be in t room"——

Mortimer looked at Helen, who face in her hands, and sank on to a the verandah.

"There," said the Countess, burstin laugh ; " that will do, old lady : not have secrets in this world.— Go along is a pretty discovery, Helen dear."

" God help me !" said Helen.

" What does all this mean ?" said M
" Have I been duped, — deceived, — fool of ? — taught to bring Helen here s prise, — as something to delight her, — has been "——

" Oh ! Mortimer " —

I'll explain it all to Francis: you are not in the least to blame; it is all my fault."

"Let me go in," said Helen; "I cannot face these people. Oh! Francis, Francis, have mercy upon me!"

"This is most extraordinary!" said Mortimer.

"Let me lean on you, Mortimer," said Helen.

"Countess," said he, "lead her in."

"No, no, no, Mortimer," sobbed Helen, — "you, you!"

She leant on his arm, and he did lead her to the door of the boudoir; but, as he went, he cast a look at the Countess, which, if she had possessed the common feelings of humanity, would have wrung her heart: — but no; she turned from his gaze with an air of triumph, and, joining her particular friend Lady Mary, merely said, in answer to an enquiring simper,

"A little domestic happiness, — that's all!"

The manner in which Lady Mary received this explanation might have satisfied the Countess, and perhaps did satisfy her, that the character of her influence in the family was not altogether agreeable to the ladies who visited Sadgrove: however, there is a certain class of adventurous women in the world, who, after having run a long career without having been actually "found out," seem resolved to fight the whole battle, and defy the usual prejudices of society, — as wicked or foolish ministers endeavour to bolster up their worst or weakest actions by heaping rewards and honours upon those who have been the active agents for carrying their ruinous designs into execution.

She turned away from Lady Mary, and, affecting a solicitude in which she knew neither Mortimer nor his wife would put too much faith, enquired at the door of the boudoir how Helen was.

Helen was leaning her burning forehead on Mortimer's bosom: he had placed her on a sofa, and drawn his chair beside it. The circumstances, the innocent disclosure made by the poor old woman, the surprise it occasioned him, and the fearful agitation of his poor wife, filled him with wonder and alarm ; but when Helen, hearing the Countess's voice, clung closer to him and held him fast, he felt that the course he was pursuing, and the line of conduct his hateful friend was adopting, was one which must be abandoned.

"Do not, do not let her come in," whispered Helen.

"No, no," said Mortimer, almost terrified into submission ; "I will speak to her myself."

"Francis, Francis dearest, do not leave me !" said Helen.

"But for one moment," said Francis.

And in that brief space of time he communicated to the Countess the absolute necessity for keeping Helen quiet ; nor did he fail to express by his manner his almost abhorrence of her conduct in making his innocent wife a party to a deception in the exposure of which she seemed to delight.

Certain it is that the Countess was by no means pleased with the manner in which her kind attentions to Helen were dispensed with by Mortimer ; and the look she gave him convinced him that, however much his natural feeling for the peculiarity of his wife's position under the influence of such a woman might in fact predominate, it became a matter of policy, for reasons known to himself, to conceal, if possible, the resentment which he could not help entertaining towards the author of the mischief which had occurred, and the misery which had resulted, as far as the suffering Helen was concerned.

“ Francis ! ” said Helen, violently agitated, “ Francis, acquit me of this deception ! It is no act of mine ; it is ”——

— “ Stay, Helen,” interrupted Mortimer. “ I am quite ready, and most willing, to make all allowances ; but surely no human being, man or woman, ought to usurp that confidence which is of right a husband's. It is true that the book I saw this morning in your room was sent you by the Countess ; I do not doubt it : the coincidence as to its contents is curious. I have no doubt either that the Countess brought you to this place ; it must be so : — but what then, Helen ? — why conceal the truth? If you had not some very particular reason, it would have been the most natural thing in the world to have told me of your visit here."

"I should have told you all, Francis," said Helen.

"Should!" repeated Mortimer;—"but you did not, Helen, say one syllable about it. You suffered me to tell our visitors that you had never been here, and that this day should be a surprise to you: you never checked me—never said you had been here. What will these people think, when it turns out"—

"These people!" said Helen: "oh! Mortimer, my beloved Mortimer! what these people think or say, matters nothing to me: it is to you alone I look; it is for what you think I alone care. I was warned by the Countess not to tell you; and, if I could make you comprehend all I have endured since we were here yesterday till this moment, you would pity me."

"But, dearest," said Mortimer, "where in all this is the evidence of that strength of mind

The pure ingenuousness "——

" Oh, spare me, Mortimer !" said
" spare me ; I am wrong — I know indeed — indeed I was misled ; I fluenced."

" Well," said Mortimer, " I should thought you could have resisted the of Madame St. Alme in my favour."

" Francis," said Helen, clasping her
" why — why did you ever render it possible ?"

" It was by your own invitation that here," said Mortimer.

" How, and by whom suggested,
Helen.

" I thought you would find society agreeable here," said Mortimer ; " and I"—— selves so decidedly and permanently with one family?"

"Perhaps," said Mortimer, "any old friends of mine are objectionable to you?"

"No, no," said Helen; "but you — you yourself, not four hours since, spoke to me of the Countess, not as if you loved her."

"Loved her!" said Mortimer.

"I mean, liked her," said Helen.

"To be sure," muttered Mortimer; "what else should you mean? Loved her! — who has been talking to you in this strain?"

"In what strain, dearest?"

"Dearest," said Francis, "your mind has been unsettled; some devil has been at work here: — what do you mean by my loving the Countess, Helen?"

"I merely used the word," said Helen, terrified at her husband's manner, "as one uses it in common parlance."

"This is all wrong," said Mortimer; "the train is fired, — everything is deception; the ground we tread is mined — hollowed. Who has been poisoning your mind against me?"

“No one,” said Helen, growing calmer and more determined as she saw her husband’s anger rise. “I have spoken of you to no human being except the Countess, who has known you so long. Mortimer,” added she, rising from the sofa on which she had been reclining, “you do not know me yet. I am too proud to make confidences; and all that I have heard, and all that has been insinuated by your friend the Countess, I have treated with disdain: and now you shall see how this proud heart that you continue to fancy capable of deceit and meanness shall bear me through this struggle. — Let us join our friends; they will wonder why we stay so long from them: and, if I perish in the struggle, no tear shall dim these eyes, no sigh shall heave this breast; and, since I can dissemble, Francis, I will make the effort now, that these hollow-hearted guests of ours may not be gratified with that which of all things would please them most, — a domestic quarrel. But mark me, Francis; I have been led into this by your friend: let me be released from her influence, and I shall be happy.”

Saying which, she hastily put together her disturbed hair, which, after a ride and stroll upon the Severn's banks, was not likely to be in the best order ; and playfully, almost wildly, said,

“ Give me your arm, Francis. Do not degrade me ; I do not deserve it : — let these people know nothing of this.”

Mortimer was startled by her manner, utterly overcome by the occurrences of the morning, and driven to an extremity by the demand of his wife with regard to the Countess : but, although convinced that she had been the victim of that artful woman's cunning, the conviction had taken full possession of him that he had, nevertheless, fallen in her estimation ; that his influence over her was now only secondary ; that other persons of the party had stimulated her in what he considered a rebellion against his will ; and, above all, he felt that the woman who, under any circumstances in the world, could coolly and deliberately conceal a visit made the day before to the spot to which her husband was avowedly and osten-

, however, implicitly on suggestions, and they rejoined the nothing had happened ; the Coun however, been good enough to th sinuations quite sufficient to cou good effects producible by Helen's triumph over her feelings. The a for the return home were made. ess again mounted the phaeton, again joined the equestrians.

What the conversation might which passed between Mortimer and ess on the road, it is impossible to s art she might have exercised to f events of the morning after her owr this one thing is certain, that on th were sown in the heart and mind of of Sadgrove the seeds of a mistrust

CHAPTER V.

NEVER had Helen entered Sadgrove with feelings like those which oppressed her on her return this day; and surely, never, taking all the events which seemed likely to result from the unsettlement of Mortimer's mind into the calculation, did there arise a stronger or more dreadful illustration of the principle, that great events turn upon extremely small ones. The whole affair of the Fishing-House, with all the concomitant proceedings, was one of the most trifling nature; but it involved a spirit of deception and insincerity which alarmed and grieved him. It might be perfectly true, — nay, the Countess subsequently admitted and protested that it was, — that she was the sole cause and origin of the visit; but, although her candour upon this part of the transac-

struction upon Helen's silence on which he, instead of attributing to the of her dangerous friend, laid to the her abhorrence of the scene of his fineness; and this, coupled with his discovery of the book, roused in his ever latent feeling, that he was despised for his former crimes by her he had looked for consolation and a of the past.

Helen, who had made up her mind to rel on their return, was almost painfully disappointed by beholding the sullen cast of her husband throughout the rest of the day. She was all spirit and animation: she vindicated her conduct, explained it and, even if Mortimer's anger had been mission to the influence of the Countess St. Alme; — but no: Mortimer's brow was overcast, and he seemed melancholy and unhappy, but he was studiously kind — almost polite — in his manner towards his wife when he did address her during the day; but the affection and tenderness which were dear to her heart were absent. The well-bred gentleman could not endure the idea of “a scene;” and, although he engaged himself generally in conversation with his visitors, no eyes except those which were accustomed to watch with tender anxiety every turn of his countenance, could have detected the change which to them was but too evident.

In this state Helen could not bear to exist: the idea of living, as it were, upon sufferance, — upon the negative, the conditional affection of her husband, — was worse than death.

“Mortimer,” said she, when they retired for the night, with difficulty suppressing her tears, “I cannot endure the change in your manner and conduct towards me, which is so evident. If I have offended you, tell me so; if I have

ed, shunned,—I cannot, indeed I cannot do it.”

“ I know of no fault,” said Mortimer, “ I feel no anger ; I may, perhaps, be surprised at the skill which you exhibited this morning during our excursion. I know no reason why you should have the trouble to deny that you had previously visited the fishing-temple.”

—“ I never did deny it, Mortimer,” said Helen.

“ No,” said Mortimer, “ I grant you that, but your tacit admission that you never had been—your dissembled surprise when I pointed out its beauties,—in short, every part of your conduct was, as you know, meant to deceive me into the belief that you were till then, a the course of which you complain, and not unjustly either. I admit the fault; but I acted under an influence, and in the belief that I was doing that which would most conduce to your tranquillity and pleasure."

"How could you believe, Helen," said Mortimer, "that I had any object in concealing from you the existence of this pretty toy, except that of surprising you by a visit to it when the fit season should have arrived?"

"I did think so," said Helen; "or, trust me, I never should have acted as you say I have."

"That seems strange!" said Mortimer, in a tone of doubtingness, which, to a heart like Helen's, was unbearable.

"It is not strange," sobbed his wife: "I was taught to think so, by one who seems, or pretends at least, to know more of your temper and character than any one else, — the Countess."

"What!" said Mortimer; "are you jealous, Helen?"

This brief question gave a sudden turn to

Helen's thoughts and feelings and a dialogue, for which Mortimer was scarcely prepared.

“Jealous !” said Helen, turning crimson, — “jealous, Mortimer ! — no : if I were jealous, God knows what I might do ; but I am not. No, Francis, never till this moment did I think, — did I fancy” —

“Hush ! dearest Helen,” said Mortimer, “I only joked : I” —

“This is no time for joking, Mortimer,” said Helen. “With a heart all your own, — with a devotion to you such as woman perhaps never felt for man, — with an earnest and unceasing desire to gain, not your love only, but your esteem and respect, — I have been led in half-a-dozen instances to conduct myself, not, as I thought, according to your views or wishes, but in strict conformity with the opinions of the Countess St. Alme as to what would most conduce to your happiness and tranquillity.”

“Did she use the word tranquillity ?” muttered Mortimer.

“I merely echo her expression,” said Helen.

“She never told me this,” said Mortimer abstractedly.

“I tell you, Mortimer,” said Helen;—“and,” added she, looking bitterly indignant at the sort of doubt of her veracity which, if not expressed by words, seemed half implied by her husband’s tone and manner, “I suppose I am at least to be believed.”

Scenes like this, dialogues like this, and the feelings whence they took their rise, are too painful to be long dwelt upon: a brief glance at them, exhibits all the misery which presently exists, and which is for the future to be apprehended.

Let the veil then fall over the rest of this discussion: it ended in Mortimer’s conviction that Helen was all truth and ingenuousness, and that she was the dupe and creature of the Countess St. Alme. But, in the midst of this conviction, there grew up a jealousy indescribable by words, and almost incalculable in thought,—a jealousy that racked his heart and disturbed his mind,—not that which he himself felt, but which he believed Helen to feel towards the lost, fallen Amelia! The plain, straightforward step which would have ensured his comfort would have been, the banishment of the Countess St. Alme from his domestic circle. Intriguing, complex and manifold, characterized that vivacious lady; and, while she remained to keep alive the recollection of other days, nothing like happiness could be expected; the more especially as, if any human being could have searched her heart and mind, they would have ascertained that whatever might be her present feelings towards Helen, her detestation of Amelia Lady Hillington was ten times more powerful and invincible.

It has already been said, that Mortimer, at the end of the discussion which took place upon the present occasion, was convinced that Helen had been misled, deceived, and betrayed by the Countess; but that conviction was rendered less satisfactory—if satisfactory ought to be the word—by the evidence adduced from events of the readiness of Helen to lend herself to what could be considered neither more nor less than deception, negative or positive.

of the man to whom her devotion was unquestioned ; and so, out of her anxiety to conform herself to his character and disposition under the control of the Countess, there was created in his imagination, besides the sensitive jealousy to which we have before alluded, a vision of weakness on her part, or rather a facility of complying with the views and opinions of others, with regard to his character and conduct, which tormented him during the rest of the night even more, perhaps, than the conviction that she had, of her own free-will, deceived him upon this occasion, would have done.

To do this extraordinary man justice, it must be admitted, that in the morning the thought which ought first to have suggested itself to his mind did glimmer there ; he did begin to think that the stay of the Countess had been sufficiently protracted : and yet, how to remove her ? — what to say to induce her to leave the place she liked most, and the place where, in England, if truth were to be told, she could alone conduct herself as she did while she was in it. The difficulty was over-persons, the gratification of which before, would have been thought with the arrangements of the family.

Ten days passed away after this and, of course, after this discussion two visitors went, one or two new but the Countess St. Alme remained the centre of the circle, fixed as securely as the Flag-ship in Portsmouth; and there she probably remained much longer but for the following letter from Jack B. to his daughter, which, as it involves a recapitulation of everything essential that occurred since the receipt of the pinky-rosy, musky, missive from Mrs. Teresa Catling to enlighten us not only as to what happened in the past but also as to what was to come in the future.

“ MY DEAR HELEN, Grosvenor St., Nov. —.

“ What I am about to write may perhaps in some sort surprise you ; although, I know enough of matrimonial happiness to know that family secrets are no secrets at all, and that therefore through Mortimer, if not by any other means, you are by this time, and have been long before, made perfectly aware of the very ridiculous mistake I made with regard to the Thurstons.

“ I declare to you, my dear child, that I had not courage to explain to you the nature of my defeat, or rather the miscarriage of my suit with that amiable family ; nor should I ever have touched upon the subject had I not previously assured myself of the certainty of being able to place myself in a position calculated not only to overcome the small obloquy which might attach to a venial error, but to present you with a mother-in-law, of whom, I am sure, you will be as fond as I am proud.

“ You will recollect, my dearest girl, a remarkably pretty, sprightly, blue-eyed, fair-haired widow, of the name of Catling, who, just out of her weeds, dined with us twice last season in Grosvenor Street. I think, somehow, you did not quite sympathize with me in my admiration of her:—I thought her charming: well, n'importe!—you are settled brightly and happily, and therefore her dominion cannot in any way affect you. The fact is, we are engaged: she has a pretty jointure, not large, but enough, with what I have, to make us quite happy for life; and I shall be enabled to secure her an equally good income with that which she now possesses, after my death, if, as the common course of nature indicates, I should go first.

“ This, I think, will please you, — at least, dearest Helen, I hope it will; for my success in this proceeding involves, as far as I look at it, no small degree of respectability to my personal character. To me the pleasure of seeing you and Mortimer at the celebration of the marriage would be great; and although I am aware of his disinclination from my brother, still he has been upon the present occasion so kind and liberal that I should consider his meeting Jacob on the wedding-day a personal favour.

“ I cannot explain all the particulars of Jacob’s conduct, but it has been such as to justify me in putting him forward; and, although he affects a perfect indifference to matters of the sort, I think he would feel pleased at finding your husband and yourself so far disposed to approve of his proceedings in this affair as to sanction its conclusion by your presence.

“ In the negociations for my marriage, I gave Teresa several reasons for my anxiety that they should be perfected with all possible expedition. I admit to you that the real one was not communicated to her; and although Jacob was in the secret, such has been his friendship and discretion that he has never even remotely alluded to it, his only joke being that I was in so great a hurry to get married because I felt that I had no time to lose: this she took in good part, and, I must do her the justice to say, seemed to participate in my proposal to expedite our settlement as much as possible. The result of all this is, that we are to be married on the twelfth, that is to say, Tuesday se'nnight. The old proverb says, 'Marry in haste and repent at leisure;' the falsehood of which we shall practically expose: but, having gained so much, and carried my point, so far as I am myself concerned, I am now anxious with regard to the arrangements to which the attention of 'the world' is to be called.

"Of course we shall be married by special licence; the expense is nothing, compared with the éclat. Then for bridesmaids, Miss Fitz-Flannery, Teresa's sister, will be one; and, I think, Miss Rouncivall, Lady Bembridge's niece, another. If I can lay hold of a bishop at this season in town, he shall officiate; if not, we have a dean certain: but, even with this, and some twenty persons for the déjeuner,—and in the beginning of November one must scrape hard to muster so many,—the affair would be manqué without you and Mortimer: your presence would give a propriety, a character, a respectability to it, especially as the wound I received was inflicted at Sadgrove; your being at the wedding would at once show to the world the nature and character of your feelings and Mortimer's, and put down every whisper militating against the reasonableness of my conduct."

In this way Batley contrived to fill four sides of his letter, arguing, as it seems, that the memory of one absurdity is to be extinguished by the commission of another; not seeing, in the hurry of his vanity smarting under its wounds, that nothing could more glaringly proclaim the heartlessness of his intended offer to Miss Thurston, than his almost immediate union with the widow Catling. As to that step being the consequence of despair, it was not likely that any woman would believe that. Because, although spite might drive a man to such an extremity, it was no doubt taken in the hopes of happiness with another, to the certain and eternal exclusion of a chance of realizing it with the original object. However, Mr. John was off upon one of his "point-blank," "slap-dash" enterprises, and nobody could have stopped him, had anybody been so disposed; knowing which, and, moreover, seeing no "just cause or impediment" why he should not "follow his own vagary," Helen contented herself with showing his letter to Mortimer, gently arguing in favour of acceding to the wishes expressed in it.

There can be no doubt that her principal motive in undertaking the advocacy of her parent's cause was the desire that he should be gratified and pleased, not perhaps unmixed with a kindly leaning towards her uncle, who had always evinced more kindness, or, perhaps one might more properly say, less indifference, towards her than towards other people; yet, if her heart had been laid open, and the inmost thoughts of her mind revealed, the chances are, that, with all these hopes and wishes, there would have been found mingled the expectation that such a move as her father suggested would have the effect of unsettling the Count and Countess St. Alme, who, although the party was broken up, and all but one or two men were visitors gone, still remained as calmly and peaceably domiciled as if they were in the château St. Alme, on the Loire, instead of being guests at Sadgrove Hall, on the banks of the Severn. In fact, from some hints and allusions which the Countess had dropped, Helen began to think that their stay would be protracted till after the end of the term at Oxford, when Francis Blocksford would be able to join them on their return to France, where the Count proposed to keep Christmas, and whither she also felt afraid that Mortimer would suggest their accompanying them.

This chain of events, galling as Helen felt it even by anticipation, she fancied might be broken by the arrangements for her father's wedding: the mere change of scene and circumstances for a few days would be a relief to her, inasmuch as it would withdraw her from the immediate influence of the woman whom she was taught at once to hate, to doubt, and fear, and yet compelled to seem to love. Her eloquence, therefore, in setting forth the justice of her parent's views, and the duty she owed him, and the pleasure it would give him, and the gratitude he would feel to Mortimer if he acceded to his request, was most remarkable.

The marriage of her father was eulogised as prudent and wise; the widow-bride was depicted in glowing colours, her beauty heightened, and her wealth increased; her worth and accomplishments were put before him in their brightest array, until Mortimer began to listen to the proposal, which he at first treated with ridicule and a refusal, with something like patience, and even an incipient desire to be present at the ceremony.

He had business in town: they could stay either at an hotel, or in Grosvenor Street; and——

“Why not offer them Sadgrove as a retirement for the honey-moon?” said Helen, half jokingly and half in earnest.

“No, no,” said Mortimer, “that would involve us in a longer stay in London than I should like; besides, what should we do with the St. Almes?”

It is impossible to guess what might have been Helen's answer if she had felt it convenient to offer an opinion; as it was, the question itself was an ample answer to her: “previous question," and she received it accordingly with a sort of doubting expression of countenance and a considerably prolonged "w-h-y;" leaving Mortimer to supply whatever else might be necessary to settle their destination. So much, however, was achieved by this manœuvre, (and let us only look at the prospect of happiness in a family where manœuvring was the order of the day, after a few months only had elapsed since its establishment,) as went to empower the lady at this critical juncture just to enquire how long he expected the St. Almes to stay.

Upon Mortimer this question, its causes, its objects, its points, were not lost; and yet he would have been infinitely better pleased if it had not been asked. He was conscious, not only that the presence of the Countess produced exactly the effect upon Helen that Helen described, but that he himself was anxious beyond measure to see her depart; but he could not, for some reason known to himself, and, as it appeared, to himself alone, or, if not, to the Countess and himself in partnership, giving you, or father, I am most ready to do ; and not be pestered by the coarsenesses Jacob” for more than one day, under circumstances I shall be too glad your father calls “honour his name in our presence.”

“And the St. Almes?” asked Helen.

“Oh,” answered Mortimer, “we leave them here : we shall be away but for a short time ; and if we should have any business here — I forget if any people are engaged with us — that week, the Countess can discharge our duties during your brief absence.”

That she might be perfectly able to manage the household, Helen did not mean to dispute ; and she, beginning as she did to understand Mortimer’s disposition and character, to ruffle the serenity of her lord and master, who, according to that same Countess's description, was as different when angry from what he was when he was pleased, as the rippling sea on a summer's day near the sunny shore is from the mountainous and foaming alternation of coal-black hill and valley in the wide and boundless ocean,—her great object was to carry the point of being present at her father's marriage, for that she knew was his point; and, weak or strong, what mattered to her, since it was the desire of a parent, — the only one she had ever known, to whom her love was devoted, as was his to her.

Therefore did she content herself with the gracious permission to go to the wedding, and followed up the somewhat questionable consent of Mortimer by touching upon the details, as to whom they should go; whether they should go to Grosvenor Street, or to an hotel, or —

“Oh,” said Mortimer, “there is time enough for all that: say we will be there.”

The words were music to her ear.

—“As to the precise time, or the particular place, that shall be determined hereafter: but mind you, Helen, you are to consider that this infraction of my rule — never to subject myself to an association with your extraordinary uncle Jacob — is to be held by you as a special grace and favour.”

Saying which, he drew his Helen to his bosom, and gave her one of those kisses of affection and devotion which go direct to a heart anxious to have the feelings with which it is overflowing, appreciated.

After this conversation and consent, Helen was as nearly happy as she could be so long as the Countess remained at Sadgrove.

One can hardly picture the delight with which she sat down in the morning to describe to her father, in an affectionate letter, the ready acquiescence of Mortimer in his wishes, and to enquire into the particulars, as to whether there would be accommodation for them in Grosvenor Street, whether he meant or wished them to go to his house, and, in fact, touching every point relative to the “exhibition” which, knowing her volatile parent's character and disposition, she felt perfectly assured he was anxious to make.

As to the proceedings of the vivacious bridegroom elect, they were most prosperous. No sooner had Jacob opened the subject to Mrs. Catling in his own peculiar manner, the abruptness and oddity of which saved a world of trouble and an age of time, it was quite charming to see how readily she acquiesced in his suggestions. This was natural enough; for, besides being really very much prepossessed in favour of Jack, and feeling a sort of general anxiety to be married again and brought forward in the world, she had been taught to consider old Jacob in the light rather of an absolute monarch than an ordinary trustee, and to measure his importance and influence by the confidence which her late spouse had reposed in him, and the extent of power over her with which he had invested him.

In the association of Jack and his intended, during the short space which intervened between the beginning and the ending of their “courtship,” there was nothing sufficiently romantic to render the details interesting to a third person, or rather a fourth; for, during their walkings, and drivings, and shoppings, they were generally accompanied by “sister Margaret.” At this brief season and its events we shall, therefore, take only a hasty glance, although it is necessary that the reader should know how delighted John was with Mortimer’s acceptance of his invitation to the wedding, a circumstance to him of first-rate importance. The announcement of his gracious intention to be present was received by Jacob with one of his most uncourteous grunts, and a hearty declaration that, “come, or stay away, it was all one to him.”

The title which has been selected for the narrative now before the reader will naturally have led him to anticipate the occurrence of several of those events and ceremonies by which the three principal epochs of a life are distinguished; and therefore he will not be disposed to quarrel with the writer for shortening the details of the second “marriage,” which it becomes his duty here to record. Certain circumstances connected with it, however, are perhaps worthy of remark.

The preliminaries were, as the reader sees, very soon arranged: the gaiety and vivacity of Jack were the theme of the widow's admiration and praise, and the little dinners in Grosvenor Street, which, by degrees, two or three of his dearest friends were allowed to join en petit comité, were quite charming; and Lady Bembridge came and made the aimable; and Miss Rouncivall and Miss Fitz-Flannery began to be friends; and all went on delightfully, Jacob having already handed over to his now happy brother one moiety of the promised thousand pounds. Just tipping Cupid's wings with gold, if the precious metal does not clog them, makes them flap most agreeably. The judicious application of even so small a sum as five hundred pounds, coming in time, makes a wonderful difference in the general aspect of affairs; and when Mrs. Catling returned to Shamrock Cottage, after passing an agreeable, or, what she called, an "elegant" evening at g -- the world on the point of

In the mean time Jacob was doing important business connected with The worldly part of the arrangements legal proceedings, were confided to his faithful councillor, Brimmer Barnard's Inn, who, although the able of attorneys in his own estimation so odious in Jack's eyes, that he could endure a dialogue of ten minutes even when business required an hour sey had the entire management of Jack's cerns; and it had more than once happened that a great deal of his brother's contempt towards him arose from prejudices in his mind by the attorney, whom could be prevailed upon to invite to Street. even although Jacob's time

ness, after his own fashion ; no bills, — no running up, — no receiving instructions, — no consulting about this, or advising about that, or conversing about t'other ; — he does everything for me by the job. ‘ Brassey,’ says I, ‘ I want to do so and so ; — can I, or can’t I ? — How much will it cost ?’ He says yes, or no, as the case may be, — fixes his price, — does it : I give him a cheque for the whole, and there’s an end.”

“ He seems quick,” said Jack.

“ Quick ! — psha !” said Jacob ; “ lightning’s a slow coach to him ! See how he managed matters at Mudbury — and here, with all those settlements and things. Why, one of your fine tip-toppers would be a month haggling at three-and-four-pence a minute : not a bit of it with Brassey, — all done at a blow. I just give him the heads : — seven hundred and fifty per ann. ; — two hundred settled on self, — at death of husband, jointure from first marriage returns to her, in addition to whatever may be left ; — eh ? — All plane-sailing — no jiggamaree stuff ! He drew Catling’s will, don’t you see ? — knows all the particulars. Well, now, for fifty pounds all that will be done, which, of course, I pay."

Jack bowed.

—"And what happens? — why, the day of the wedding, nothing remains but to sign the settlement, and all's safe. No worries, as I say, about references and consultations — does duty for both clients; I have known him, under the rose, act half-a-dozen times for plaintiff and defendant in the same cause; — it simplifies matters. Besides, when one has got hold of an honest lawyer — eh? — it's as well to keep him."

"I leave all this to you, brother," said Jack; "you have a longer head than I."

"You shall be taken care of," said Jacob. "I always take care of myself, — you don't. Brassey shall get all ready, and you will have nothing to do but sign; so, set your heart at rest."

Jack's delight at being relieved from any lengthened intercourse with Mr. Brimmer Brassey was great; but it was somewhat qualified when Jacob suggested that it would be considered “uncommon rude” not to invite him to the déjeuner. Jack felt the strongest inclination to demur; but Jacob was so important a character in the drama about to be enacted, that he had not the courage to “speak up.”

“My reason for pressing it,” said Jacob, “is this: Brassey doesn’t think small beer of himself; and although, as far as he personally is concerned, I shouldn’t care three straws if he were hanged to-morrow, so that my accounts with him were all square,—which, please the pigs, they are every Saturday night,—I think it might give him a better idea of me to see me amongst the lords and chaps whom I despise, but whom he worships.”

“Oh!” said Jack, “there can be no difficulty about that: you know the invitations will all come from Teresa; but, I dare say, she will have no objection.”

“She!” said Jacob with a contemptuous sneer; — “no, I think not: her objections wouldn’t go for much with me;—I look to myself—eh?—that is my principle. What — am not such a bumpkin as to anybody does keep in with me he can get. Catling, to be sure, a lump of money ; but then he l at reasonable interest, during hi hadn't paid me, somebody else w but a noodle-pie after all — eh ?”

Jack never permitted himself t Jacob ; and, as he certainly could thize with him in feeling or prin lowed him to have it, as he call own way.” He was quite sure th the safe side while Jacob espouse in the financial arrangements ; and was truly stated by him, that the of a marriage settlement, by the c which the gentleman had nothing to | ladv all to confer the said — to do the whole business, although Jack had at the very moment resting upon a shelf in a leading and important solicitor's chamber in Lincoln's Inn one of those brown cannisters of which mention has elsewhere been made, upon which his name appeared painted in white letters, perfectly legal as to length under the last new act for regulating the descriptions of owners of carts, vans, and caravans, and which might have secured a dealer in "Marine Stores" from the penalty to be pounced upon by some pettifogging picker-up of pence in the shape of a common informer, in regard to the dimensions of the characters which over his door announce the character of the owner of the house. In fact, the isolated Jacob had succeeded in establishing a kind of dogged influence over everybody around him, — certainly not obtained by conciliation or fair means, — which had the effect of putting down all opposition to his will, unless it happened, as it had occurred in the case of Mortimer, that his subjects rose into open rebellion and threw off the yoke altogether.

...and more romantic)—was as was this perfect accordance and things in concatenation accord completely divested it of real did nothing but laugh; Tressa her, laughed from morning to Margaret couldn't answer the o tion without bursting into a fit fulness: even Jacob chuckled, Brassey tittered, and the infec general, that Mr. Grub, the he confidential clerk, could scan countenance seriously inclined ing the ledger in Lilypot Lane.

All this certainly was hetero seems an established axiom in “merry wedding” should be a ceremony — — — — —

should also be present at the "nuptial ceremony;" not only because he was somebody in his way, but because he was the chosen and particular friend of Mortimer: not but, if he had known the real truth, he might have felt less disposed to cultivate or cherish his acquaintance, since the first important difference that had ever arisen between him and Mortimer occurred upon the particular point of Helen's marriage. Fortunately for the world, its inhabitants are not omniscient; and Jack took Magnus for what he seemed to be, and held that he would be ornamental as one of the party.

"I guess," said Mr. Brimmer Brassey, as he was sitting after dinner at Shamrock Cottage with Jacob and his brother, — for there John Batley was forced to endure him, — "I guess, as the Americans say, that Colonel Magnus won't show: his paper is a good deal about. I think, — only, of course, we professional men say nothing except where we are not ourselves concerned, — I have seen his name in queer places: and I think that, although he “ Chock, block, and belay sey. “ I heard of his having ter only a fortnight ago tryi money, — I think I could gu sistance; but, of course, I no harm done to anybody, do it.”

Jack was perfectly convince was right as to the period that city, and also of his retu with him to London; and th that his facts were in all prol accurate.

“ I know,” said Batley, “ he ter at the time you mention, there with my son-in-law, and ca with him myself.”

“ . . . ”

a good deal; and, by not hearing from him lately, we are fearful he will fall into bad hands, and get into the X, Y, Z line."

"Brassey," said Jacob, acting as interpreter, "Brassey means, into the hands of advertising money-lenders."

"I see," said Jack, not without a sort of unpleasant feeling of consciousness that he was in the company of a gentleman who, from the nature of his calling, and the general course of his practice, might have seen his name in some of the places in which that of Colonel Magnus had figured; "but I understood that Colonel Magnus was a man of considerable property."

"Probably you heard himself describe it," said Brassey, who, as all vulgar-minded men invariably do, grew familiar and impudent as he warmed with his subject. "Great talkers, Mr. Batley, are the least doers; and those who flourish most in words, are the least flourishing in fact. No: depend upon it, you will not get him to the breakfast or dinner, or whatever it may be."

“ I had no idea,” said John, “ that the case was so bad.”

“ Nor anybody else,” said Brassey, “ but we, sir,—we who know and see, and work the wires that make the puppets dance. Lord bless you ! I could show you such things about your tip-topping friend—only, of course, we of the profession are sealed,—as would astonish you.”

Jack, who had always hated Brassey, began to find his aversion gradually increase as the man’s familiarity progressed, and already he had satisfied himself that his first impression of his character was the just one ; nor did he altogether rely upon his own judgment, for he had mentioned his name to his own solicitors, and they had, without descending to particulars, sufficiently corroborated the prepossession he entertained in his disfavour. The high, the honourable, and the respectable solicitors of London are as completely the antipodes of the skulking, sneaking, jobbing, dirty attorneys, as the elite of St. George’s, Hanover Square, are of the worthy inhabitants of New Zealand ; so that every sentence Mr. Brimmer Brassey uttered, reduced him one step in Jack's estimation.

It is said that there never was a book published which did not contain something worthy of notice ; it may be that there does not exist a man from whose conversation something valuable in the way of information may not be extracted. Hating and despising Mr. Brassey as John Batley did, he had certainly received an enlightenment from him upon the subject of Colonel Magnus's circumstances which was at once curious and interesting. With all his activity of mind, his thoughts had never taken that turn ; and when he became the companion of the Colonel in his journey to London, he certainly did not entertain the slightest suspicion that his removal eastward from Worcester was the result of the failure of an attempt to raise a sum of money in that city upon Mortimer's credit : nor, to say truth, did he feel at all obliged to Brassey for the enlightenment he had afforded him upon the subject ; on the contrary, the flippancy of manner in which he client, disgusted him; for although he might not have been in direct contact with Brassey, it was perfectly evident that he had become familiar with the circumstances, and the course of his life by some professional intercourse with a man who had.

As the evening, or rather afternoon, advanced, and Mr. Brassey "passed" his time, which he did with surprising activity, he came more lively and loquacious, and was consequently more odious to Jack. He continued to lengthen the pleasures of a weekly dinner at a convivial club, as he called it; to which he had been invited, where there was always a remarkable "spread," and where, he ventured to say, he had the best port wine in the parish.

nine, the smoking began ; and then —— and so he went on, until Jacob, taking fire at the mention of smoking, rang the bell for some cigars, and some punch, and Jack made his escape to his intended.

Hapless swain ! little did he anticipate that his fair Teresa would be ordered by her obdurate trustee to prepare with her own hands the beverage he loved so much. As Mrs. Catling the wife of his friend, she had been taught to compound it according to an approved recipe ; and, as Mrs. Catling the widow, he expected her to continue her services. Jack, of course, bore all this philosophically ; and while his intended was gone to the fulfilment of what she really seemed to consider her bounden duty, he and Margaret remained talking over Mr. Brimmer Brassey, who, it seemed, was more than half convinced that the said Miss Margaret was in love with him,—which, if it be true that women endeavour to conceal their affection by abusing the object of their devotion, he could not have doubted for a

Dalley had a sharpish bat his pride, which revolted against not only a great want for his feelings on the part positive degradation of his in the eyes of the establishment the future mistress of the mans Street being compelled to "ma in order to do it secundum art the butler's pantry,—was so re was with difficulty he smother tion, and endeavoured to dive tumbling about the contents work-box, over which, in orde once her industry and "genti busying herself about nothing : an effort. To be sure, a few chance the . . .

patiently endure what was exceedingly galling : and as the infliction was perfectly characteristic of his brother's unmitigated selfishness, he resolved to put a good face on " the business," and seem entirely satisfied with what was going on.

The nectarious compound having been judiciously concocted, and then deposited on the table by the hands of the fair widow herself, who uniformly acted Hebe upon such occasions, she joined Jack and her sister in the other room, leaving the bear and the boar to revel in all the luxuries of smoking and tippling, while the more refined portion of the party were enjoying the calmer delights of coffee and conversation, alternately sipping and gossiping till the little clock on the chimney-piece that never went right, struck ten.

" Well, Mr. Brassey," said Jacob, knocking away the burnt end of his cigar, " you have read over the draft of the settlement to Mrs. C. ? "

" Does a duck swim ? " said Brassey, giving forth a puff which would have made the funnel of a steam-boat jealous, uncommon pleasant,—easy to de buckram,—a great favourite with doubt; and what I call quite the “Umph! that’s it,” said Jaco very fine gentleman too, as I alway

“I’m afraid,” said Brassey, giv puff, “that Mr. Mortimer will ge with Colonel Magnus,—eh, sir?—th thing going on in the accepting an line.”

“I don’t care three brass fart happens to him, or anybody else,”

“He is another fine gentleman,— eh?—friends as they call themselves, knew how these matters would end,
I care?”

“No,” said Brassey, “I don’t a are flying ; — I shouldn't mind dabbling a bit ; besides, it might be of use to the parties."

" Never you mind that," said Jacob, filling his glass : " take my advice,—put yourself out of your way for nobody, nobody will ever put himself out of his way for you ; stick to your six-and-eightpences, that's your mark. You have read the settlement over to Jack too ?"

" Of course," said Brassey, " and he is equally pleased with the lady."

" Well done !" said Jacob, " that's something : there, you see, I please two people by pleasing myself ; — all comes to that, — eh ? Now, Brassey, another glass ? this is very pretty tippie. We shall shift our quarters to Grosvenor Street soon, — nearer at hand than this London-gone-out-of-town place ; that's one of my objects : I shall get my Sunday dinner without having so far to go for it."

" Colonel Mortimer is coming to the wedding," said Brassey, in a tone which implied his knowledge of the fact, although he was merely fishing.

" So I hear," said Jacob ; " and of course as in the way which ladies wish to their lords."

"What way is that?" said Jacob, "if I believe any ladies love thei a-days; but Mortimer isn't a lord."

"No," said Brimmer; "what delicate allusion out of a play, sir that Mrs. Mortimer is — as I he family way, sir."

"Oh, ah," said Jacob, "very l sure I don't care; I suppose the li the world must be kept up, and it right: I haven't heard anything ab can't say; it's nothing very rema way."

A pause followed the ungracious Jacob had inflicted upon Brassey.

"Have you managed about the a Perch will take the old one at the price named, and two years' credit for the new one."

"Right!" said Jacob, "money is money; and I see no use in keeping a chariot in a coach-house to wear itself out: besides, there's the interest for the two years. That's a good bargain — eh? — for me at least. Monday, I shall hand Jack over the other five hundred pounds — get that off my mind — nothing to repent of there; — and when are the things to be engrossed?"

"Three days will do the needful, sir," said Brassey.

"I have nothing to do with the stamps," said Jacob.

"Nothing, sir," replied the attorney; "and on the wedding-day we will sign, seal, and deliver."

"Just so," said Jacob; "and I'll tell you what" —

What that was, the reader is not at this moment doomed to know, inasmuch as the servant entered the room at the instant to enquire whether Mr. Batley would like to have any cold meat, or broiled bones, or anything to wind up the evening.

“Odds bobs!” said Jacob, “what! is it getting late enough to ask that question? No,—nothing—nothing more to eat.—Is tea over?”

“A long while ago, sir,” said the man. “My mistress’s compliments, would you like a little more punch?”

“What d’ye say, Brassey,—eh?” said Jacob; “warm it up again,—eh?”

Brassey inclined his head and smirked, as much as to say with Bombastes in the tragedy, “Whate’er your majesty shall deign to name,

“Short-cut, or long, to me ’tis all the same.”

“As you please, sir.”

“A leetle more, William,” said Jacob; “about half as much as before; and—d’ye hear?—put it in the drawing-room with two clean glasses; we’ll go and sit there,—the fire is getting low.”

William obeyed.

“Shan’t we disturb the lovers, sir?” said Brassey, with an arch look.

“Lovers!” said Jacob, making a face

“Pooh, pooh ! Mr. B. what have they to talk of that we mayn’t hear? Why, the one’s a widow, and the other, according to your account, very near being a grandfather—hey? No—no, come along; I dare say Jack won’t dislike our interruption: if he does, I can’t help it; I can’t let myself get cold to please anybody: so come—let us move.”

And move they accordingly did: nor was their appearance in the drawing-room in the slightest degree annoying to the Philander of the evening, who, with all his resolution to be pleased with the widow, found it rather a toil to keep the conversation going.

This discovery did not much disconcert him, inasmuch as he had seen numerous examples of domestic happiness in cases where the intellectuality of the wife ranked vastly below that of the husband: nor did he entirely disapprove of the principle of unbending and relaxing his mind, when quiet and at home, by bringing it to the level of that of his fair partner,—not altogether losing sight of the satisfaction to be derived from a consciousness of superiority

tions, brushed up his greasy hair, himself next Miss Fitz-Flannery, been again reduced to the task of honours, and making herself agreea sequence of Jacob's second demand services of her sister. His convers this occasion was made up of enquir Miss F.-F. had lately been at t whether she had seen Mr. Tidmarsh and what she thought of Miss P Juliet, and a lamentation that the could not be members of the Slap to which he belonged, where he was F. would be delighted with the sir supper.

When Jack's carriage was announ engaged places for himself and his ticularly inconvenient to Batley, who had no intention of going home so early; but, as Jacob's will was law, all was done according to his bidding, and, at about a quarter past eleven o'clock, the triumvirate took their departure from Shamrock Cottage.

CHAPTER VI.

It must not be supposed that, during the period which had elapsed since Mortimer's marriage, his exemplary sister had ceased to watch with nervous solicitude the course of his proceedings. She was indeed, and in every sense of the word, exemplary; and the love she bore her brother was the real cause of the dread and apprehension of which she could not divest herself as to the happy issue of his second marriage. The correspondence between them had ceased; but, without adopting any unfair means of ascertaining the real state of their domestic affairs, Mrs. Farnham was not without information as regarded the proceedings at Sadgrove: one of its visitors, was an old friend of hers; and from her, during her stay there, she learned enough to render her extremely anxious for the future happiness and respectability of her brother.

It appeared to Mrs. Farnham, from all she could hear, that the position of her new sister-in-law in society was one the least in the world calculated to secure her from what the politician would call "the pressure from without." She had received descriptions of her character and disposition from one who had known her from childhood, and who was fully alive to the peculiarities of her temper, which, although based upon high principle and uncompromising candour, seemed, in her eyes, fearfully conducive, at some period of excitement, to dissolve the bond of union which held her to Mortimer, whose temper so far resembled that of his wife, that, the moment he fancied that efforts were making to deceive or delude him, his rage, amounting to frenzy, would know no bounds.

Mortimer was conscious of his own weakness; and never did man struggle more earnestly, even at the sacrifice of bodily health, against the workings of his mind, than he did :

but informed, as his sister was, of Helen's independence of spirit and impatience of control, her apprehensions were the more awakened to the future peril of their happiness by the circumstance that Helen had no real female friend, — no experienced councillor, who might not only by advice but example point out to her the course of conduct by which she might even conciliate, and so eventually reform, the husband who had sought in his marriage with her, the restoration of his peace of mind, and a gradual oblivion of his past indiscretions. On the contrary, having been brought up without a mother, placed early in the control of her father's house, and accustomed to associate with his companions, she had, as has already been remarked, no female friends whose advice she could seek, or whose counsel she could adopt; and, as if to make this evil the greater, her husband had supplied the place of such an associate by domesticating in his house the Countess St. Alme.

Why he did so, Mrs. Farnham could not imagine; but when, in reply to her disinterested and earnest remonstrances upon the point, she received a harsh and unkind answer, she ceased to press a matter upon which she was plainly told her interference was not required ; that Mortimer was master of his own actions and of his own house, and that, so long as that was the case, he did not feel disposed either to ask or accept advice as to the regulation of his conduct ; that it was sufficient for his sister to know that the Countess was one of his oldest friends to induce her to denounce her ; and that, since she had refused to do him the honour to afford Helen her countenance and friendship when he had expressed the warmest wish that she should do so, he must beg to be left unmolested in the pursuit of the course which, under the circumstances, he had considered it best and wisest to pursue.

If ever the blindness of a man of the world were made evident, it exhibited itself in this proceeding of Mortimer. It is not at this moment our business to dive into all the particulars of the intimacy which subsisted between Mortimer and the Countess, nor to ascertain the real cause of the influence over him which she unquestionably possessed: suffice it to say, that he knew her as a worldly woman, — an intriguante, — daring and insincere, — and that yet she had the power to make him believe that, from her perfect intimacy with all the circumstances of his former marriage, as well as with the peculiarities of his own character, she was, of all persons in the world, the one to soften down any difficulties which might arise in the progressive developement of those truths connected with his former attachment, — and accustom Helen to the occasional gloominesses and exacerbations of temper to which he was subject, and which had their origin in the recollections which her sweet influence was destined to overcome.

How the Countess fulfilled the task, we have seen; why she acted as she did, we have yet to learn: but, let her motives have been what they might, their results were not unknown to Mrs. Farnham, who began to repent, when she felt it was too late, that she had sacrificed friendship and a feeling of distaste, which she now thought she ought to have overcome, the chance of securing her brother's happiness.

She had even heard the intelligence to which Mr. Brimmer Brassey had so "genteelly" referred at Shamrock Cottage, which increased the interest she felt in her sister-in-law, and led her to look forward to the period when the attentions of one so nearly connected with her as she was, might be most valuable to Helen: in fact, she repented of having withstood her brother's invitation, and resolved to overlook the harshness of his last reply, in the hope of rescuing those who were dear to her from a fate which she considered inevitable, if the visit, and consequent power, of the Countess St. Alme, were permitted to continue. This design the amiable Mrs. Farnham lost but little time in putting into execution. She wrote to Francis, and told him that her friend and family had resolved to visit England earlier than they had at first intended; that she proposed accompanying them; and, having therefore faithfully fulfilled her engagement to them, she should be too happy to offer herself for a visit to Sadgrove for as long or as short a period as he and Helen might choose to fix.

—“ And,” added she, “ tell your young and beautiful wife, for so I hear she is, that I shall press her to my heart with the feelings of a mother rather than a sister. The difference between your age and mine, dear Francis, has always given me a sort of semi-maternal authority over you; and, as Helen is still your junior, why may I not cherish a sentiment towards her which will necessarily involve that care and those attentions which, at no great distance of time, may probably be acceptable to her? Bid her think of me, then, as if I were the parent she has lost; and do you, dear Francis, teach her to love me as you think I deserve to be loved by one who is so nearly and dearly allied to you.”

Francis read his sister's letter. He threw it from him.

“ This,” muttered he to himself, “ is trick, — artifice, — design. Some tattling gossip-monger has been plying her with news of my misconduct; or else she thinks me incapable of preserving my own honour and reputation without her assistance. It is evident her opinions are changed; she is willing now to come to Sadgrove, — ready now to do that, which a few months since I vainly implored her to do. She finds that I will not endure her literary lectures, and so has resolved to settle herself here to preach them personally. No, no! —all that I sought to do has been done: Helen knows the whole of the history, which I feared might startle her, and heeds it not. Emily would undo all this: — if it had been her pleasure to come to me in the outset, — but no, — not now: she then inflicted a wound which this offer cannot cure. Nay, she herself has pleaded in the strongest terms against the very course she now proposes to adopt, by fixing herself for an indefinite term in my family to act the part of mother to my wife, when her own letters distinctly deprecate such a system, and uphold the undivided dominion of the mistress of the house as”——

Mortimer's thoughts glanced towards the

him of this intimacy,— had even disbelief in the possibility of the intimacy continued. Was it circumstance which had induced her resolution of remaining alone not that, which had roused her unpleasant and inconvenient to was perfectly certain that the Alme and Mrs. Farnham could very acceptance of her proposal signal for the immediate removal the Countess being sufficiently the world, even if she had not acquainted with Mrs. Farnham wards her by her brother, to replanations of whys and wherefore upon such an occasion. the fact come; and, on the part of the Countess, that Mrs. Farnham would not come if she did not go.

Francis gave the letter a second perusal; and then (a circumstance which may pretty well explain the course of affairs at Sadgrove) proceeded to the morning-room, where his wife and the Countess were sitting, and handed the despatch to the latter to read.

"An offer of a visit, Helen," said Mortimer to his wife. "I will give you leave to guess from whom."

Helen, seeing that the letter, the contents of which the Countess was eagerly devouring, in all probability announced the fact, felt somewhat startled by being permitted to surmise about an event which was so regularly and officially confided to his guest.

"I cannot imagine," said Helen: — "not my father?"

"No," said Mortimer, "not exactly; but from a lady who is good enough to wish to perform the part of mother to you. I suppose she imagines that you are not able to take care of yourself, and that I am not able to take care of you."

"Who is that?" said Helen. "I was not aware that there was anybody in the world sufficiently interested in my proceedings to take such pains in my behalf."

"The lady is no other than my most reverend, grave, and potent sister," said Mortimer — "a lady who has the quality of acidulating everything she approaches; who looks upon everybody as doomed to eternal destruction, who does not act up to what she considers propriety, rectitude, virtue, &c. &c. &c., and is the completest wet blanket that ever was thrown upon the warmth of a domestic fire."

"Mrs. Farnham!" said Helen, and the tone in which she repeated the name was not exactly in accordance with the sketch which Mortimer had drawn of her. Helen had heard her spoken of in the highest terms; and even the Countess herself, who hated her, had taught Helen to understand that the real cause of her sister-in-law's absence from England and the wedding was a scrupulous sensitiveness with regard to Mortimer's former errors, and a nervous doubtfulness of the success of his scheme of reformation; so that, although Helen had been taught to fear, and even dislike her, by the Countess, she had learned from other reports, — probably enough, from the very friend who had communicated to her the details of what was passing at Sadgrove, — to respect and revere her.

—“ And will she come?” said Helen, feeling at the moment a fervent hope that she might; more especially since her opinion of the protracted, or rather continued, stay of the St. Almes, was no longer a secret from Mortimer.

“ I should think not,” said Mortimer: — “ how should she? We shall go to France in December, and she does not propose coming to England until the end of November.”

“ Do you really mean to go to France?” said Helen, wishing to be informed as to the strength of his resolution.

“ So the Countess says,” said Mortimer.

“ What does the Countess say?” said the Countess herself, laying down the letter.

remark; "but perhaps Mrs. F. grimage may alter your determinot let us interfere with her piings."

"May I see the letter?" said H. air of humility not quite so well surprise at the fishing-temple.

"Have you finished it?" said carelessly to the Countess.

"Oh! yea, I have done with the lady, tossing it to him across th-

"Then," said Helen, "I pre-see it."

All that had passed between her mer on the subject of the Count-more than the Countess herself flashed into the minds of - their lively guest, the character of which would have excited any other than pleasurable feelings in her bosom.

“ I suppose,” said the Countess, with a pert toss of her head, “ we are bound to make way for your sister, Mortimer ; and that not only we must retreat, but you must abandon your intention of visiting us, to receive her.”

“ I have said, Countess,” replied Mortimer, “ we are engaged to you.”

“ But why,” said Helen, putting down the letter for a moment, “ is it necessary that one engagement should destroy the other ? Is there any reason why you should not receive your sister before the Count and Countess leave us, and then we might go ?”

“ No,” said Mortimer, “ that wouldn’t answer.” — And Helen did see the look at the Countess which followed this declaration.

“ But wouldn’t you like that Mrs. Farnham should come here ?” asked Helen. “ I am sure her letter is full of kindness and good feeling.”

“ Yes,” said the Countess, “ she is all kindness to those who happen to come up to her notions of propriety and rectitude ; but her benevolence is extremely circumscribed. I believe I am not upon her list as one of those who can be preserved from destruction, merely because I do when in Rome as Rome does, and have been guilty of going to a play on Sunday in society where it is thought no sin, or of violating every tie of morality by making a parti at Ecarté after the said play was over. I know she thinks me a most abominable person."

Helen looked at the lady, and felt the force of the contrast which the words then glibly flowing over her roseate lips, afforded to those contained in her sister-in-law's letter ; but she saw that Mortimer was determined upon his course of proceeding ; and that the lively Countess's influence would prohibit the visit of the amiable widow.

This circumstance weighed heavily upon her mind. She appreciated the kindness and affection which evidently had prompted Miss Farnham's forgiveness of Mortimer's previous letters to her ; and, anticipating the troubles and difficulties which she really was destined to encounter, dwelt painfully upon the decision which would deprive her of the society and support of so amiable a being. It was, however, all of no use. The answer to Emily Farnham's offer was brief and almost harsh, conceived in the spirit which dictated her brother's first remarks upon it when he received it, and couched in terms little more civilized or considerate.

It was impossible for Helen not to be conscious of the triumphant air which the Countess assumed when it was ascertained that this refusal had been given, or, in fact, that her power had outweighed that of the woman she detested, and whom Mortimer ought to have loved; and for the next two or three days she joked Helen on the possibility of doing without her volunteer Mamma, who was probably more anxious to assume the character in jest, from never having filled it in earnest. Nor was Helen better satisfied, than she was with this playfulness, by seeing that it pleased her husband, who seemed to seize every opportunity Batley's marriage drew near. was, whether the St. Almes should Sadgrove during the absence of his lady, or that they should all remain in London for a week or should take flight for France; it depended chiefly upon the exertions of young Blockafoord from his laboratory: and it must be admitted that in the discussion, Mrs. Mortimer leaned to the latter scheme. She felt that she was leaving her establishment to the control of a lady for whom, from the feelings which she had for her, her affection could only increase, was something like a degree of a practical admission of her superiority, and even a sort of admission of ownership.

even regard for the Countess, than from some indescribable power which she had over him, to become fascinated — in the real rattle-snake sense of the word — by her looks, and subside into a passive obedience to her will, which even his earnest desire to conciliate his wife, and calm her apprehensions, was not sufficiently strong to counteract.

A new difficulty, however, arose out of this affair, inasmuch as the Countess, who had a great fancy for “patronizing,” and who, reckoning upon her “title,” such as it was, imagined that she gave éclat to whatever she condescended to sanction; or rather, perhaps, one might say, that she wished it to be thought that she thought so; and, therefore, as soon as the arrangements for their all going to town were in a state of forwardness, she addressed herself in some of her sweetest tones to Helen, and, dressing her vivacious countenance in its brightest smiles, suggested that, as they should be in London at the time of her father’s marriage, she should be extremely happy to attend, if he felt that it would be agreeable;

“for,” added she, “he is a very charming person, and I wish him all sorts of happiness; and besides, Helen dear, he is your father.”

Now it so chanced, that in a letter from her father, that very morning received by Helen, in answer to one which she had written, speaking of the probability of going to town en masse, he had written thus:

“One worry appears to me probable from the general dispersion of your party, and its general movement upon London,—I mean as relates to the Countess St. Alme. She will, I suppose, naturally expect to be invited to the wedding, and I would not have her there upon any consideration. I have engaged the best of the few folks who happen to be in town, or passing through it; and, although I have no doubt of her amiability, and sociability, and utility, and all other ilities in the world, there are people who carry their dislike of her so far as to consider being brought in contact with her an offence. It would be the most unpleasant thing in the world to have anything of that sort happen upon such an occasion; and you how can I exclude her, unless by some extraordinary bit of good luck they should be engaged? Try to manage this; for, I declare to you, I cannot have them with anything like comfort to myself."

The lady's expression of her gracious intention to honour the noces et festin with her presence, coming so immediately after Jack's decided declaration of the impossibility of receiving her, was a sad puzzle for Helen, who dared not call her husband into council, inasmuch as she was perfectly assured the whole history would be told to the St. Almes, and in all probability would induce Mortimer to decline being present himself.

"I am sure," said Helen, "Papa will be too happy, if his arrangements are not all made. I believe the party will be very small, and confined entirely to relations."

"Oh dear no," said the Countess, "I have heard of half a dozen people who have been invited, and I believe it is to be as gay a thing as the time of year will permit: however, don't bore yourself about it; I will write to your at least to shift the responsibility of her to her volatile partner, hoping to hear what he says."

"I should think," said the man, shaking his head in a manner peculiar to him, "he can say but one thing.—I will volunteer myself."

And so this brief colloquy appeared to poor Helen that every day and hour entangled her more in difficulties, from which she ought to have been perfectly free. She proceeded to her boudoir to write what had passed, to "Pappy," and to leave the management of the matter to his discretion.

This incident in itself —

expressed, she dared not communicate in confidence to her husband, under the apprehension that that confidence would be broken in favour of the woman in whose society she was forced to live, and the power of whose influence she was daily and hourly made to feel,—and yet without any show of unkindness on the part of her husband, who seemed to think the domestication of the Countess in his house as much a matter of course as that of his wife.

Little did Batley dream of the actual state of affairs at Sadgrove: indeed, the active preparations for his own happiness superseded all other matters, and the payment of the second moiety of Jacob's liberal gift put him so completely at his ease in the way of outfit, that Grosvenor Street looked gayer than ever. A second seasonable application of two or three hundred pounds brightened the prospect, and the smiles of the fair widow amply repaid him for all the trouble and expense which were bestowed upon the repairings and refittings to render his bijou of a residence worthy of her reception.

When, however, Jack received his daughter's letter, which came by the same post as the Countess's offer of patronizing his nuptials, he was, as the saying goes, "struck all of a heap." What was to be done? a man of the world in a dilemma is a moving sight; and see what the consequences to him would be arising from this contretemps! Besides several extremely respectable persons, the Bishop who was to marry him, and his wife and one of his daughters, had promised to breakfast with them; and the Countess St. Alme was no company for lawn sleeves. This he knew; but if he did know it, and knew that it was only in a very few places she was tolerated, he ought long before to have sacrificed every feeling but one, to have objected against Mortimer's retaining her as a constant visiter in the house of his daughter. Then, besides this, if he now evaded her visit, having before tacitly admitted her respectability, &c. what would she say?—what would Mortimer say?

He had certainly so far committed himself to Helen as to beg and hope she might not be of the party, but he had given no specific reason, nor perhaps could he have given any ; but it was not a question of morality, or propriety, or even of virtue or vice, that worried him now, — it was how the thing was to be managed so as to offend nobody. Nobody hears names at parties, and the Countess's person was by no means well known in London, therefore it might all pass off quietly ; and even if, through the officiousness of the Butler or Gunter, the names of the Count and Countess St. Alme did creep into the Morning Post, there they would be together, husband and wife,—and what more could the most fastidious of mankind or woman-kind require ?—At all events, it seemed impossible to avert the blow ; and so away went a letter to the lady, full of delight and happiness, and “nothing could be so kind, and nothing could make him so happy as presenting his amiable Teresa to her ; and nobody could be so charmed to have the honour of making her acquaintance,” and so on ; and these honied words travelled side by side in the Sadgrove bag with a brief but animated scrawl to Helen, depicting all the parental miseries and anxieties in terms alternately the most glowing and most pathetic.

What a world it is ! Further on in our narrative we shall perhaps take occasion, even with respect to the family whose affairs chiefly demand our notice, to let the principal actors in the domestic drama stand forth and speak for themselves under circumstances where their candour will be unquestionable : for the present we content ourselves with the rare specimens of worldly sincerity afforded us in the two letters despatched at the same time from Grosvenor Street to Sadgrove.

" Well," said the Countess gaily after luncheon, " I have done what I said I should do, and have got my answer."

" From whom ?" said Mortimer, " and about what ?"

" Mr. Batley's marriage," replied the animated lady. " I resolved to patronize it, wrote accordingly, and have received a most gracious reply : so we shall make an agreeable party of ourselves, let what may happen."

" I do not think," said Mortimer, " it is a manner indicative rather of grief than of any capacious disinclination to be present, "that shall be there."

"My dear Francis!" said Helen, "why, Pappy will break his heart if you disappoint him."

"You can go, dear Helen," answered Mortimer, in a tone of marked kindness; "it is your company he desires: we will all go to town, and you can make some commonplace excuse for me."

"I know," said Helen, "why you hesitate; it is on account of my poor ill-mannered uncle."

"No, Helen," said Mortimer; "to that I had made up my mind; but it is—in fact, I think these ceremonies tedious, and one always seems de trop, and—in fact, I dislike"—

"Well, then," said the Countess, "if Mortimer does not choose to go, we can go without him, and dear St. Alme here will take care of us both,—won't you, love?"

"Certainly, to be sure, ma chere," said the Count, "whatever you ask of me."

"I think," said Mortimer, "Helen had better go alone ; she will naturally feel an interest in the marriage, and we can all be with Barley and his bride-elect, and dine with him the day before, and make the lady's acquaintance ; it is the ceremony I would avoid."

" And now, pray, let me ask why ?" said the Countess.

" Oh !" said Mortimer, " there is a fuss, — and worry, — and dressing in the morning, — and — in fact, I must decline it."

" But," said Helen, " my dear Francis, you promised"——

" Yes," said Mortimer ; " but your father is resolved to be so very fine, that a common good parish-priest will not suffice him, — he must have a bishop to tie the knot."

" What !" said the Countess, laughing, " are you frightened at a bishop ? What bishop may it be ?"

" The Bishop of Dorchester," said Mortimer, fixing his look on her animated countenance.

" And is he such a dragon of piety that you dare not face him ?" asked the lady in a laughing tone of voice : " I have no such fears."

What is the name of this most formidable prelate, — for, not living in England, I am not well informed as to English episcopacy ?”

“ His name,” said Mortimer, slowly and distinctly, without moving his eyes, which seemed riveted on hers, — “ his name is Sydenham.”

In an instant the whole expression of her countenance was changed ; its animation was gone ; a death-like paleness left the rouge on her cheeks a palpable pink, ghastly and unnatural ; she gazed with an unconscious stare upon Mortimer, who remained motionless in his seat before her, resting his chin upon his folded hands.

“ My dear Countess,” said Helen, starting up, “ surely you are very ill. What is the matter ? — Mortimer dear, what is it ? — Here, give her some water, Count.”

“ Yes,” said the Count, rising, and walking slowly to the table from which she had retired, and filling a glass of water, “ she is sometime often so when somsing is not to disgest.”

The look Mortimer cast upon the poor little man, expressed, to Helen’s perfect dissatisfaction, that he was thoroughly aware how much of mind mingled in the lady's disorder.

She soon rallied, thanked Helen for her care, believed it was the heat of the room, and begged St. Alme to ring for her maid. All this was done; the bell was rung,—the maid came,—the Countess retired; she recovered,—dined at table, and was as lively as ever: — but she did not go to Mr. John Batley's wedding.

Nobody can doubt that these frequent developments of innumerable little somethings which she did not comprehend, had the effect of keeping Helen's mind in a constant state of unsettlement; but still, although sad fits of gloom occasionally affected Mortimer, she had no cause to complain of his conduct towards her; on the contrary, whenever he had exhibited any symptoms of a ruffled temper, she had been — unconsciously it will be admitted—to blame: but this last scene, taken in conjunction with her father's evident dismay at the Countess's approach, led her more than ever to feel the necessity of again urging upon her husband the necessity of relieving her from an association, which, although the Countess, when she chose, was a delightful companion, she felt to be painful, unnatural, and disreputable ; although, of course, she knew nothing of the real cause of her sudden abandonment of her design about the wedding.

It is extraordinary with what ease and readiness people of the world contrive to find some excellent reason for suddenly changing their minds, when the alteration has become absolutely necessary. It was but two days after this affair that the Countess received a letter from her son at Oxford, in which, as she said, he reported himself so extremely unwell, that he had been advised to go off to Cheltenham ; that the advice of his physician had been sanctioned by his tutor ; and that he had taken his departure for that Montpelier of England, where, he trusted, his mother would contrive to come to visit him, if it were only for a few days.

Never did indisposition seem more sympathetic than that of mother and son in this in-the St. Almes from the difficulty might be, which hindered their marriage; and it got rid of the illness which Helen had somewhat laid upon to her husband, of leaving a session of Sadgrove during the summer. Thus were all their little aspersions removed, and the day that the Mortimer family left London, the St. Almes took a carriage for Cheltenham, at which place Lord Mortimer was to meet them, in consequence of a letter written by his mother expressing her anxiety to see him there on his business, and in which not one word of ill health or change of air was mentioned.

It is impossible to express the relief that Batley experienced when he heard the greatest imaginable activity, and with bride elect and her sister continued his day after day, till that arrived which finally to seal their destinies.

That day, as all days will, at length came ; all the forms and ceremonies, which we already anticipated in description, were framed upon the most liberal and extensive

We have already deprecated the idea of entering into details, and yet the reader would not be satisfied without hearing some of particulars.

In the first place, it should be understood that Mortimer and his lady dined with Batley, Mrs. Catling and Miss Fitz-Flannery, lay before the wedding: nobody else was ; and Mortimer was extremely agreeable and gracious; and Helen felt extremely glad at finding herself a visiter in Grosvenor Street House, although, as yet, it had passed into the hands of another mistress ; but Helen made up her mind to like her new mother-in-law, and behaved, as she did when she chose, so as to engage and win all hearts. It struck her that the rooms all looked smaller, that the hall was narrower, that the sky was darker, the atmosphere thicker, the little inclosed garden behind the house more miserable, and the sparrows that hopped about it much blacker than they used to be; and the rattling of the coaches astounded her; a knock at the door, which could be heard in the dinner-parlour, startled her; and, when she returned to sleep at the hotel, the air seemed less pure and fragrant than she used to think it when stepping from Almack's to her carriage, breathing the incense of sundry link-boys, or curtailed within Lady Bambridge's five-feet square box at the opera, she inhaled the odour of gas, and the breath of some two thousand exceedingly warm ladies and gentlemen. Habit is second nature; and the return to scenes, now for some months abandoned, only served to show her to what people must necessarily submit who are resolved to live in "the world."

The after-dinner conversation of Montmartre and Batley upon this special occasion was precisely what might be expected from two men of the "world" placed in their relative positions,—a sort of extremely friendly and confidential interchange of thoughts and sentiments, in which not the slightest approximation was made to the actual state of affairs, or the real nature of their opinions.

"I was sorry," said Jack, "that your charming friend, the Countess, is unable to honour us with her company to-morrow, as she had kindly promised."

"Her son is unwell," said Mortimer.

"She is a most agreeable person," said Jack, "quite an acquisition in a country-house."

"Extraordinary spirits," said Mortimer: "she is a very old friend of mine; her husband was a worthy man."

"The son is a fine youth," said Jack.

"Yes," said Mortimer; "very like his father, I think."

"I don't remember ever to have seen him," said Jack. "Pray, Mortimer, when do you expect Magnus in town?"

"That I don't exactly know," said the son-in-law ; “ he has been obliged to go to a sick aunt, or cousin, or something of that sort in France :—exceedingly inconvenient to him just at present ; but he is so kind-hearted that he sacrificed every personal consideration to the desire expressed by his relative.”

“ It was quite unexpected,” said Jack ; “ the day we came up to town together, he knew nothing of it.”

“ No,” said Mortimer ; “ it is impossible to describe his activity, slow as he seems to me, when he is actuated by any sympathy which touches his heart. By the way, Batley,” continued Mortimer, “ what a prize you have drawn in the lottery of life !—a favourite expression, I remember, of Lady Thurston’s, speaking on the same subject ;—your widow is charming !”

“ Upon your honour ?” said Jack, holding his glass in his hand in a state of suspense ; “ really,—eh ?—do you think so ?”

“ Quite charming,” said Mortimer, “ perfectly handsome ; and so extremely natural, nothing maniérée.”

“ I think she is all that,” said Jack, sipping his wine, and looking diffident; “ there certainly is no pretension about her : and, I think, the more you know of her, the more you will like her.”

“ They are nice people,” said Mortimer; “ the sister is very agreeable,—lively.”

“ I am delighted to find you think so,” said Jack. “ I really look forward to a very nice family circle. I do think we may not be very unacceptable guests at Sadgrove.”

“ Nothing can be more delightful than the anticipation,” said Mortimer.

And so these two men of the world went on deceiving themselves into the belief that they were deceiving each other : Batley “ buttering” the Countess, whom he detested; and his son-in-law praising the widow, whom he dreaded,—upholding the benevolence of Magnus, whom he knew to be a bankrupt in fortune, and vouching for the extraordinary likeness of Francis Blocksford to his deceased parent, to whom he bore no more resemblance than Julius Cæsar did to Sir William Davenant : and, to crown

ten o'clock in the morning; 1 moment he said so, that he Bishop of Dorchester for ten

They joined the ladies, an amusing to Helen to see her the lover on the same scene a few months before perform now enacting by Mrs. Catlin tremely agreeable manner and nile appearance favoured the thing could seem more happy and bridegroom elect.

When the party separated Helen entertained not the sligh that Mortimer intended to aban the ceremony, and subsequent at that period of her life, not never yet had exerted the power of that independence which is the privilege of the married woman, and felt as if she should sink under what appeared to her the heavy responsibility of acting entirely of herself and by herself. Mortimer was perfectly aware of her unsophistication touching this point, and therefore never dropped a hint of the probability or possibility of his not fulfilling the engagement for which he had expressly come to town. By the course he purposed to adopt, all beseechings, and remonstratings, and entreatings would be avoided; and the indisposition which he intended to plead as an excuse, would be of so extremely slight a nature as not to alarm his tender wife's fears; while his desire that she should punctually fulfil her father's wishes he was quite sure would be acceded to, as the performance of a double duty to both husband and parent.

The morning dawned brightly on the second marriage which it is our duty to record in these pages, and in all its circumstances and details the event very closely resembled the first we had to notice. Lady Bembridge and the one bride's-maid, and Mrs. Catling and the other, with Helen, formed the female group. Jacob Batley, and Mr. Grub the clerk, and Mr. Brassey the attorney, being, with the exception of Lieutenant Horseman of the Life Guards, and the Curate, who assisted the Bishop, all the men whom in the then state of London he could secure. The defection of Mortimer, and the excuses of some five others, left him thus painfully deserted; while, with the exception of Lady Bembridge, pledged on account of her niece's official character in the proceedings of the day, all the fair promisers had broken their faith. Poor Batley was exceedingly annoyed, not more by the absence of those who stayed away than by the presence of some who came. Brassey, vulgar as he was, was a necessary evil, and Jacob had both his near relationship and great wealth to plead in extenuation of his appearance; but Grub surely might have been omitted: however, as the whole affair originated with his brother, of whom Grub was the special favourite, it was useless to repine; a few words of explanation to the bishop would set all that to rights. But the failure was most painful: nevertheless, it might to be considered that his disappointments were all attributable to the season, and the emptiness of town, and the absence of all the "world" in the country.

When Mortimer, in the morning, imparted to Helen the impossibility of his venturing out, in consequence of a most dreadful sore throat which had suddenly and violently attacked him during the course of the night, she, as he had anticipated, declared her going without him to be impossible; that "Pappy" would break his heart; that she should be so miserable, that she could not bear the idea; and so on:—for all of which he had prepared by having called in the nearest resident apothecary, who assured the lady that, although the gentleman would run a great risk in exposing himself to the cold atmosphere of a church, there was not the slightest doubt but the confinement of even one day would restore him. This assurance, backed by a grave asseveration on the part of the same judicious practitioner, that he would not answer for the consequences if the "gentleman" went; and enforced by the supplication of Mortimer, that she would go without him, Helen, more readily than he anticipated, acquiesced in the opinion expressed and in the mandate issued; and accordingly dressed, and proceeded to the mirthful scene, where she was the expected ornament.

The reader probably has discovered by this time that Helen Mortimer was a person of strong mind and quick perception; and although the tactics of "the world" in which she had been trained, and the policy even of the parent who had trained her, had not in the slightest degree injured her own principle, or deteriorated her own sincerity or single-mindedness, they had afforded her an aptitude of forming opinions upon very slight grounds, and deducing probably great results from actually trifling occurrences. Strange to say, however painful to her the refusal of Mortimer to accompany her to Grosvenor Street on the wedding morning might be, the surprise at his not going, was by no means great. From the moment the which the Countess St. Alme exhibited such unequivocal signs of emotion at the mention of the Bishop of Dorchester's name, Helen felt assured that she would not, even after volunteering, present herself. The tone and manner which, upon that occasion, Mortimer pronounced the name of the Bishop, convinced her that he was fully aware of the reasons which existed for her not going to her father's wedding: thence she inferred, she scarcely knew why, but instinctively as it were, that the name of Sydenham was somehow connected with the circumstances of their early lives, much of which she knew, even without the friendly enlightenment of Lady Mary, they had passed together; and from that moment she anticipated that Mortimer would not endure the meeting to which it was evident the Countess either could not, or would not, submit herself.

It was perhaps this pressentiment, or rather conviction in her mind, that induced Helen the more readily to agree to the suggestion of going alone: she had a duty to perform to a father whom she loved, and who affectionately loved her; and she believed, more especially after the declaration of the apothecary, must to be affecting and emphatic, that her original suspicions had been just, and were now justified by the sudden ailment of her sensitive husband. This was not what it ought to have been, but it was natural that it should be.

Now come we to the point :—the carriage, — the bride, — the bride's-maids, — the friends, the few, the select few, — and the procession to the church, where the Bishop met the cortège. The ceremony was performed: there was no crying; the affair went on without sensation; and the party returned to Grosvenor Street, Bishop and all, — the Bishop's lady, however, being unable to join the party on account of a dreadful cold.

Down they sat. Gunter had been active, and had done his best on Jack's limited scale; there were high baskets and low baskets, and silver absurdities and tinsel absurdities, and pink fooleries and white fooleries, and all the other trasherics out of which a fashionable conlectioner contrives to make a fortune, drawn from the pockets of an aristocracy whose best-paid tradesmen are generally their bitterest political enemies: and the thing went on, rather off, extremely well; and the new Mrs. Atley looked marvellously pretty.

The Bishop seemed to watch Helen and her conduct, and listen to her conversation, with an interest which excited a deep interest in her. He was a man in all respects qualified for the high and important position in society which he filled. Mild and amiable in temper and disposition, benignity and benevolence beamed in his fine countenance. Beloved by his family, in which he was the best of husbands and happiest of fathers, he was venerated and esteemed by his inferiors; and whosoever passed through the vicinity of his palace heard the blessings of the poor implored upon his head, as the most excellent of masters and the most charitable of men. Born of high blood, he was full of high principle: — not suddenly elevated from obscurity and a sordid lust for gain, but devoted to the sacred profession to which he had voluntarily, anxiously, and conscientiously devoted himself, and which he graced and honoured by his virtues and his talents. Such was the Bishop of Dorchester; — such was the Bishop that Mortimer did not dare to confront; — such was the Bishop upon whom the eyes of the wife of Mortimer were fixed in admiration and respect.

Mr. Brimmer Brassey, who cared no more, spiritually speaking, for a bishop than a beef-eater, loved him outrageously only because he was a lord; and therefore contrived, by one of those very extraordinary manoeuvres which such men sometimes perform, to get next his lordship at the déjeuner. Helen doing the honours, the Bishop sat on her right, the bride on his lordship's right, and next the bride, Brassey. The bride shortly disappeared to prepare for her change of costume, and the party still remained: thus came Brimmer Brassey next the Bishop.

The Bishop poured a few drops of wine into his glass, and, rising from his chair, proposed the healths of the newly-married couple. How the toast was received, nobody can doubt. Jacob, who had never been in company with a bishop before,—except, indeed, in the shape of a tankard of burnt port-wine, with a roasted Seville orange stuck full of cloves swimming in the middle of it, — did not know how to get on: not so, Brassey. His lordship having agreed to wait until the “young people” took their departure for St. Leonard’s, where they proposed to pass the honeymoon, Brassey, finding himself so conveniently placed, in the very first lull of a conversation not particularly lively, looking the Bishop full in the face, twiddling one of his horse-hair whiskers with his finger and thumb at the same moment, said, à propos to nothing, and in a tone of perfect confidence,—

“I say, my lord, what does your lordship think of the voluntary principle, — eh?”

The Bishop looked a good deal surprised, and began folding and unfolding the napkin which he held in his hand: after a moment, he bowed, and smiled graciously, and said,—

 “I really am not prepared to answer that question. I”——

Batley, who had, previously, ~~to the attorney~~, undressed himself and ~~re-dressed for the journey~~, looked, as the ~~sailors say~~, “~~flashing~~ spikes” at the attorney; but ~~that did nothing~~ he had got hold of a bishop, ~~to work~~, and a lord to talk to.

—“Because,” continued he, ~~“my lord, what~~ I wanted to say to your lordship is this, my lord:—if, my lord, your lordship will only put your lordship’s nose out of your lordship’s chariot winder, as your lordship goes down to the House of Lords, your lordship will see, if your lordship will but look”——

“I believe,” said the Bishop, “Mrs. Batley is waiting for us; at least, the carriage is”——

“Ay, ay,” said Brassey, “that’s it, my lord. I never can find one of your lordships to”——

“I appeal to you, Lady Bembridge,” said the Bishop, “if we ought to talk or think of nothing this morning but the happiness we anticipate for our friends."

"Why," said Lady Bembridge, "I never have an opinion; but, when a ceremony of this sort takes place, it is certainly understood that the object of the meeting is connected to the particular celebration of the — Oh! dear, here comes our charming Mrs. Batley!"

Luckily, the appearance of the widow-bride, in a morning dress which became her infinitely more than the extremely mal-à-propos adornments of lace and satin, and all the etceteras, ill adapted to broad sun-light, stopped this charming conversation; and, the carriage being pronounced, the affair seemed at an end, and everybody prepared for a start.

Batley felt agitated and excited: he had undergone certain mortifications as to the party;—in fact, there was nothing to relieve what might be called the absolute vulgarity of the company, save and except the Bishop's wig and Lieutenant Horseman's moustaches: the last was painfully below Jack's mark; and, to say truth, besides all those anxious palpitations which, of course, must agitate the hearts of young bridegrooms, Jack felt almost as much relief in dispersing his ill-assorted party, as he did in finding himself so very near the exclusive possession of his second Mrs. B.

Everybody was now on the move: the functions of Lady Bembridge's niece were at an end, and she brooded under her aunt's fostering wing; Miss Fitz-Flannery was to remain with Miss Rouncivall for two or three days: the horses were pawing the pavement, and the cockneys were standing in a group before the house-door: — inasmuch as even the simple fact of calling a hackney-coach and getting into it, or stopping one and getting out of it, will infallibly collect a group of spectators in the metropolis, in which, it is supposed, the great mass of the people have not a moment to spare.

“I beg your pardon!” said Brassey to Jack, who shrank from his appeal with a horror the most sensitive, — “Mr. Grub, will you?”

What was to happen, Jack did not justly understand.

“It is just merely to sign the settlement-deed,” said Brassey. “Will you ask Mrs. Batley to come? — it is all ready in the back parlour. Grub will be witness.”

“Oh ! to be sure,” said Jack, delighted that something like business gave the horrid Brassey a momentary claim upon his attention ; — shall I call her ?”

“If you please,” said Brassey, doing up his hair with his fingers.

Batley called Teresa, and Teresa came, — and so did Jacob ; and then there were Teresa, and Batley, and Jacob, and Grub, and Brassey ; and there was the deed of settlement, drawn according to the draft submitted to Jack ; and Jack signed it, and Teresa signed it, and Grub witnessed it, and Brassey certified it : and then Jacob kissed Teresa, and so did Batley ; and so did Brassey, which Jack did not much like ; and so did Grub, which Jack did not like at all : — however, it was all settled and done, and the carriage was quite

“ By Jove! sir,” said Br
“ what a fortunate man you are — eh? —and her devotion to y

“ Yes,” said Batley, “ yet pooh-pooh-ing way, and endeav off his toady.

—“ But, Mr. Batley,” said pression of countenance whic attention, “ you do not know how much you really do owe he to tell you.”

“ How do you mean?” said J

“ A proof of her devotion, “ which is, as we say at the S entirely unequivocal. That kin ture had a jointure of fifteen h a-year so long as she remaine extent of her disinterestedness till the affair was irrevocable."

"Sacrifice half her jointure!" said Jack, — "amiable, excellent woman! — this is a proof of her affection. But to whom does the other seven hundred and fifty pounds per annum revert?"

"To your brother Jacob," said Brassey.

"Come," said the Bishop good-humouredly, walking into the room, — "come; the bride is in the carriage and waiting."

"Thanks! my lord," said Jack; "here I come: so, good-b'ye! and a thousand acknowledgments for your kindnesses! — So, that's the story, is it?"

Mr. John Batley was forthwith buttoned up with his new wife, and away they went. The party almost immediately separated; but, in addition to the rest of his liberality upon the occasion, Mr. Jacob Batley gave a snug dinner to Messrs. Brassey and Grub at "The Horn," at half-past four, with an extra bottle of Mr. L.'s port, to commemorate the day upon which he had ensured the happiness of his brother and a charming lady ; and had, at the comparatively trifling sacrifice of one thousand pounds, secured to himself an additional seven hundred and fifty pounds per annum out of the estate of his late friend Kit Catling.

CHAPTER VII.

o a man of Batley's character and disposition, nothing on earth could be so ill-timed surprise like that caused by Mr. Brimmersey's intelligence. He was, to use a colloquial phrase, "struck all of a heap" by this evidence of his worldly brother's avarice and self-love; and, if his vanity had been somewhat mortified by the defection of his aristocratic friends from his wedding, his amour propre was infinitely more wounded by the fiction that he had been made the dupe of a near relation, for whose intellectual qualities he did not entertain the highest respect, to whom he was perpetually in the habit of offering advice, based upon the soundest principles of the science of diplomacy.

But above all this, and more acutely, did he feel the extraordinary position in which his wife's sacrifice of half her income out of sheer affection for him, had placed him with regard to her. He never had expressed, never could have expressed, his high sense of such a mark of attachment and devotion, inasmuch as he never had been made aware of the fact till the very moment before he stepped into the carriage. She must unquestionably have considered him strangely insensible to her kindness, inasmuch as she never could have given him credit for ignorance upon so striking a feature in her conduct; and even now, he could not endure that she should become acquainted with the fact, that the circumstance had never been imparted to him, or that he had suffered himself to be so completely led and outwitted by Jacob.

But above all did he feel the loss of the moiety of the lady's jointure, arising, as it did, from the extraordinary propensity for "grasping," which could induce one brother to act so unfraternally towards another, as Jacob had acted towards him. The reflection that, had g the influence which he evidently did s over the widow, he might, by waiving nal condition of the will, have put fifteen ed a-year into his possession for life, t the positive sacrifice of a shilling of his endered the mere loss of the additional a secondary grievance. Now was it that olved the problem of the thousand pounds

; now did he account for all the hospi-and welcomes he received at his brother's the moment the scheme of marrying atling was started ; and, to add to the santness of his position, all these facts, stances, incidents, plots, contrivances, rangements crowded into his mind at ry moment when his thoughts should een exclusively employed in expressing fair companion the happiness he enjoyed attainment of the object of all his earth-es, and the fulfilment of all his worldly

. Catling—or rather Mrs. Batley—was all slow in discovering the extraordinary which had taken place in her dear scheme to make her undeappreciated the sacrifice a sake; for, after all, Jack He sought a wife, to soothty; and, having made up considered it prudent to bring to their common stoin a certain degree, to the ture of his establishment; b that Helen was settled in nothing: — but then, the upon him by Jacob, — the peddling selfishness of the Lane, created feelings whi have been excited, but w sible for him entirely to con-

Upon the mind of the n

xperienced by the noble lord who bought
, and found, when he got him home, e could not make him squeak ; or that, the lady, who had united herself to a he fiddle of the company, felt when she as the old story goes, that, once domes-
, her facetious partner used to hang up dle in the hall with his hat. Your very and agreeable creatures in society are by ans so gay and vivacious when at home, as “monarchs of all they survey,” they ie full force of the authority which ems them to bestow all the residuum of dulness, or even ill-humour, which long heavy expenses, and a small revenue, are means ill calculated to generate, upon near connexions and relations. And, as gh spirits, the bow must be unstrung imes:—the people whose feelings are most ble by gaiety and mirth, if their feelings ust be worth anything, are always, as e poetically tells us, the most susceptible y, compassion, and sorrow.
be sure, in her first matrimonial experihome and foreign conduct ; lived a matter-of-fact man ;

was one, — perfect, pure, ar Equally incapable of taking joke, his conversation, when what he called the pleasures the various modes of cooki esteemed dishes ; and, when c ter, was directed to the devel prudential schemes for gettin and accumulating being the his care and ambition : the re by his exertions and assiduit repose under the floor of J and his widow's second marri of half her jointure.

But although Teresa had li sphere than that to which she had been dragged down by her weighty partner afforded ; and having, as she thought when she rose on the morning of her second marriage, secured to herself the society of a man whose tastes and feelings seemed entirely to assimilate and agree with her own, it may easily be supposed that the consciousness of the sudden alteration of his look and manner, which has been already noticed, caused a pang in her bosom which she was ill prepared to feel.

“Are you ill?” said the lady, looking doubtfully at Jack ;—there might have been a slight dash of reproachfulness in the glance.

“No,” said Jack, “not ill :—no, my dear Mrs. Catling, — not ill.”

“Mrs. Batley,” said Mrs. Catling, drawing up coldly and somewhat indignantly.

“I beg a thousand pardons!” said Jack, “but,—really,—I have just heard something,—something so very surprising,—so very mortifying,—that,—upon my word and honour,—I”——

“What does it relate to?” said Teresa.

“Why,” said Batley, more puzzled than cate, — and so very abominable explain; — it must explain

“How very strange!” she never saw you so agitated news? — tell me, as the first fidence in me. If you don’t I have done something, or if something about me, calculate your esteem.”

“No,” said Batley; “it raises you in my esteem. It principal difficulty of my case my sense of gratitude for the made on my account.”

“Oh!” said Mrs. Catling, whose heart was full of Irish spirit, “now I know what —”

and there, I say, is the difficulty, — to think how insensible of your kindness I must have appeared, never to have expressed my thanks for your giving up — in short, — really it seems strange !”

“What !” said Teresa, with a look of comic astonishment, “did Mr. Brassey never explain that to you ?”

“Never till the instant I left the house,” said Jack.

“Oh !” said the lady. “And what difference does it make in whose name the money is paid, so as we enjoy it together ?”

“Enjoy what together ?” said Jack.

“It is all one,” said Teresa ; “we won’t quarrel about that, rely upon it : you are quite welcome to call the other half yours. I dare say you won’t stint me nor starve me.”

Hereabouts Jack became more mystified than he was before, and it took at least eighteen miles of reasonably moderate travelling to make the case entirely clear to the comprehension of the “high contracting parties ;” but then, after nearly two hours had been expended in the discussion of the business, it appeared that Mr. Brimmer Brassey, as solicitor on her part, had represented that Jacob's liberality towards his brother was such, that, although she nominally must forfeit half her jointure by the marriage, he should take care that her husband should receive it; while, as solicitor for Jack, the same Mr. Brassey had entirely omitted any mention of such desire or disposition on the part of Jacob: and thus, by playing the game for both hands, the worthy trader had completed his design, satisfied from the delicacy of the lady, and the thoughtlessness of Jack, that the parties themselves would come to no explanation; a circumstance rendered most certain by Jack's frequent expressions of gratitude for his brother's liberality in the affair, which she, without venturing to touch the matter further, was fully convinced referred to the sacrifice of the other seven hundred and fifty pounds a-year, which, with a generosity equal to her own, he had nobly given up in order to bring about the much-desired marriage.

It was droll to see, — or rather would have been had there been a third person present, — but it was droll to hear afterwards, how gradually Teresa and her husband advanced in the avowal of their hatred of Jacob's avarice, and in their abuse of him generally. Teresa, of course, went slowly at first, for fear of wounding her new husband's fraternal feelings; and Jack was gentler in his remonstrances, lest she should be annoyed by his reprehension of the friend of her old one: but as they warmed with the subject, and as Jack's spirits rose in consequence of having unburthened his mind, their abuse of the curmudgeon with whom they were both so nearly connected, knew no bounds; nor did the attorney get off with much less vituperation. A sentence of exile from Grosvenor Street was on the instant pronounced against them both, the more especially as Mr. Brassey — a fact already alluded to — had made some rather unequivocal manifestations of a desire to be received as the suitor of the yet unmarried Miss Fitz-Flannery.

It was, however, fortunate for the peace of mind of the bride and bridegroom that the explanation had been come to. He was charmed to be assured of the warm-hearted disinterestedness of his fair partner ; while she, in being able to account for a depression and silence which at first excited her alarm and apprehension, entreated him to think no more of the unhandsome trick which had been played off upon them, but to believe that, poorer or richer, she could never be happier than she was at the then present moment.

And so the sunset of the wedding-day was brighter than its rising, and, during a stay of three weeks in their retirement, each hour seemed to add to their esteem and affection for each other ; and although, as has been already surmised, Mrs. Batley the second was not remarkable for any high intellectual powers, she was gay in her manner, handsome in her person, gentle in her blood, and good-humoured beyond question : and Jack walked up and down, and here and there, with his pretty wife on his arm, quite satisfied with his bargain, and wishing every minute of the day that

Miss Thurston could only just see how charming a partner he had secured for life.

At the end of ten days Miss Fitz-Flannery joined them at St. Leonard's, and there, for the present, we will leave the trio; Jacob being not a little surprised at never receiving a line from any of them, but, as usual, not caring enough about them to trouble himself to inquire into the cause of their silence. He might have guessed; and, if he did guess, it is extremely probable that he and his legal adviser might have agreed that it would be best to let the transaction remain as it was, without making inquiries which might produce replies.

As to Helen, who, of course, was soon informed by her father of the extraordinary conduct of her uncle, she felt herself, for the first time, at ease, and mistress of her own house. The absence of the Countess St. Alme was a positive relief to her: Mortimer devoted himself implicitly to her society, and appeared as if, like herself, he was delivered from some unaccountable influence which seemed perpetually to keep him in a state of alarm lest he — 70 — after the marriage to Sadgrove, Mortimer concerning the ceremony being chiefly confined to the conduct of the Bishop. Whatever were the ties with a good and exemplary man, whatever the reasons which Mortimer's absence from the ceremony were perfectly clear to the people, Helen that they were equal to the Countess was concerned. In conviction satisfied her that, whatever some bond of union existed between the husband and the lady, the nature did not permit herself to question the principle of action which, ready seen, she had seen.

either did or were likely to interfere with her own comfort and happiness. It should also be remembered that, upon all the occasions when she had broken through this golden rule, she had been led to its infraction by the very woman who seemed, as far as one could judge, to have the strongest possible reasons for not recurring to days that were gone, or scenes that were past.

But the calm, however, was of short duration: Mortimer again became nervous and gloomy and irritable. It is scarcely possible to describe the anxiety and restlessness which seemed to affect him when three or four days had passed away, because it is scarcely possible to explain — scarcely to understand — the doubts and apprehensions which kept him in the most unenviable possible state of mind. It was not jealousy of others that excited this perpetual fear; as has been before stated, it was jealousy of himself that tormented him. The slightest and most perfectly unintentional reference by Helen to anything that had occurred while the house was full of guests, struck to his heart; and, before the week of domestication was over, he had satisfied himself that the great design of his life in marrying Helen had failed. In fact, the pleasure — the delight which she experienced during the first three days of those seven, in finding herself shut out from the world with the man she loved, gradually faded in exact proportion to the increasing evidence of his mistrust; and, truth to be told, she did not regret hearing that Colonel Magnus, whom individually and personally she disliked, was expected; nor that Mr. Francis Blocksford had invited himself to pass a few days at Sadgrove at his mother's particular desire.

“Dear Mrs. Mortimer,” writes the Countess, “the Count feels so much benefit from the waters and the air, or probably the regular and abstemious life which the Cheltenham doctors enforce as an auxiliary to both, that I have resolved on remaining here, although it is not the usual season, until we take our departure for France. Mortimer and you will, of course, arrange as to our meeting,—the point de reunion and all the rest of it; but, in the mean time, Francis, who absolutely raves about you and Sadgrove and all its agrémens, wishes to be allowed to look again at the first English country-house he ever saw, at a different time of the year from that in which it first won his heart ; and so he will be with you to-morrow. If Mortimer can give him a little shooting, so different from the chasse with us at St. Alme, he will be delighted. He is really a kind, open-hearted boy ; and, although his present figure and appearance make me look rather old, it is not because I wish him to go from me that I have encouraged his disposition to leave Cheltenham, but because I wish him to go to you. I know you will like him ; he deserves to be liked ; and his godfather, young as he was at the time when he undertook the extremely ill-understood and little-regarded sponsorial duty, will, I think, not be displeased at showing him a little English sport."

Amiable, plausible, fascinating Countess ! What ! knowing that Mortimer and Helen were alone, did she fear that they might find their own society so agreeable as to induce them to do without the infusion of external gaiety? — or did she wish Francis her son to become the more constant associate of Francis her friend, before their departure together to the Continent?

When Helen read, or rather gave the Countess's letter to Mortimer to read, watching, as she always did, every turn and change of his expressive countenance, she did not think, from what she saw, that he was altogether gratified by the proposition of the lady or the volunteer visit of her son: indeed, he did not leave his feelings upon the occasion to be guessed at.

“Umph!” said the master of Sadgrove: — “this is not altogether convenient. Surely, if we are so soon to join the St. Almes, she might have at least waited to improve my acquaintance with her son till we were all together.”

The tone in which these words were uttered, and the short personal pronoun by which Mortimer somewhat emphatically designated the lady, convinced Helen that her sensitive and band was what the vulgar call "put out of his way" by the proposition.

"Oh," said Helen, "poor, dear fellow! why shouldn't he come if he likes?"

"Ah!" said Mortimer, "why not, indeed! —But if I do not like."

"But he is your godson, Francis," said Helen.

"I am quite aware of that fact," said Mortimer; "but, whatever my duty towards the young gentleman may be, it is extremely inconvenient having him just at this particular time. I expect Magnus; and he and I have many things to talk over,—matters of business, —and"—

"Well," said Helen, "all that you can talk over in the mornings. Give Francis Blockford a keeper and dogs, if he wants them; and, while he is amusing himself in the woods and copses, you and the Colonel can be managing all your state secrets."

"Who told you, Helen," said Mortimer, "that my friend Magnus and I had any secrets?"

“Nobody, dear Francis,” said Helen, almost alarmed at the manner in which the question was put, — “nobody, except yourself just this moment.”

“I!” said Mortimer.

“Yes,” said Helen more firmly, and in a tone which, if he had properly appreciated her character, he would have known indicated a resolution to maintain her ground in any discussion of such a nature as that which he seemed not particularly anxious to avoid. “You told me that young Blocksford’s visit is particularly inconvenient just at this moment, because Colonel Magnus is coming, and because you and he have subjects to discuss.”

“Ay,” said Mortimer, “subjects, but not secrets.”

“Ay,” said Helen proudly, and perhaps in a more imitative tone of voice and manner than he had ever seen her exhibit before; “but if subjects that cannot be discussed before a third person are not secrets, what are?”

“Indeed!” said Mortimer, looking surprised at the earnestness and animation of his wife;

"why, Helen, you take high ground upon this question. Is young Mr. Blocksford really so very charming a person, that his proposed visit can make you at once so eloquent in the cause?"

Helen uttered no word, — no syllable; but she fixed her bright black eyes upon the pale countenance of her husband, and looked as if she waited for an explanation of words the meaning of which she did not understand: — this was what her look conveyed. He was at no loss to comprehend his meaning.

"I tell you," continued Mortimer, beaten at his own weapons, caught in his own snare, and driven from the line he was about to take by the firm resolve, and look of conscious dignified, and yet indignant affection which Helen assumed, — "I tell you that Magnus and I have no secrets, but we have matters to talk over; and perhaps, besides that, he may bring a friend with him, — and, — I" —

"Oh!" said Helen, in a manner which fluctuated between the submissive and humble, and the scornful and ironical, "any friend of such a person as Colonel Magnus must surely be a suitable associate for the son of the Countess St. Alme."

"I don't know that, Helen," said Mortimer; "at least, you can be no judge of such matters: it is extremely unpleasant to me."

"I have done," said Helen, who was not sorry to find that any proposition of the Countess was liable to such a reception. "I have only to write to the Countess, and say we are unluckily prevented by circumstances from receiving her son."

"You write!" said Mortimer, in a tone which cut Helen to the heart; not because it was calculated to arouse her to a sense of her helplessness and inferiority, but because it served to carry fresh conviction to her mind that, be its cause or origin what it might, there did exist a power of control and command in the Countess over her husband, which, although the lady might choose to conceal them in the present instance by communicating her wishes about Francis Blocksford to her, she had no power to resist or withstand.

me, Helen," said Mortimer, lowering his voice to a positive refusal to one of conditional acceptance, "the task of entertaining the gentleman must devolve entirely upon his eye followed the conclusion of the scene to that of Helen, who felt her eyes as his looks fixed themselves upon her and her heart beat rapidly; but she could not believe that she understood what was implied.

He saw he had inflicted a wound, and he repented.

"Countess," said he, "treats us, I trouvez en bas. It is all extremely well for herself here; but making my house her son, and putting my preserves at disposal, is a little too much."

"Then, Francis," said Helen, earnestly, "if you think so, refuse her—decline the visit. Let us not go to France; let us remain here. My husband and his wife can come to us, and so get rid of St. Almes at once."

"Ha, ha!" said, or rather laughed,

Mortimer, if that could be called a laugh which sounded almost sepulchral. "So, because the Countess worries me for the moment by offering her son as a visiter at an unendurable period, I am to relinquish the oldest friend I have in the world. No, no. I will not tell the Countess of your suggestion, Helen; but do not make it again."

The manner in which her husband disclaimed the intention of making the communication to the lady, led Helen to believe that he would make it to her at the first opportunity; and she almost repented of the burst of ingenuousness which had betrayed her into making it.

"He must come, of course," continued Mortimer, in a tone indicative of the positive necessity of submitting to the absolute will of his mother; "and then, I suppose, we shall all meet at some given point preparatory to our start:—London I should prefer. London, in my mind, is the nearest way to every place in England from any other; and now write, Helen,—say how glad we shall be to see him: tell him he need bring nothing with him."

nor any other implement of sport, he will find everything here : and give my best love to his mother, and so on — you understand the façon de parler ; — and, as you say, Magnus and I must transact our business' affairs in the morning, and — yes, yes, we shall make it out, I dare say. Write by this afternoon's post," added Mortimer, as he quitted the room ; "and, dearest, give direction for Magnus's room to be got ready, and a room for his friend, — if he bring one ; and if he should not, which I most sincerely hope may be the case, there's no harm done."

As the door closed, Helen's eyes remained fixed upon the space which her husband had so recently occupied. What was her destiny, — what was to be her fate. Every day, every hour, afforded her fresh evidence of the unsettled state of her husband's mind, and of the restlessness of his feelings. He seemed to live a life of constant doubt and apprehension, — of care and watchfulness ; and when the fit was on him, his words, hastily and unguardedly uttered, and his manner, flurried and discomposed, combined to assure his devoted Helen, that her affection for him was questioned, and her sincerity suspected.

The tears, which pride had checked while he was present, chased each other down her cheeks now that he was gone: she felt alone in the world, as in truth she was. As has already been remarked, the circumstances of her youth, and the mode of her education, had left her without female friends of her own age and standing in life. She looked round her and saw no one to whom she could appeal for either advice or support: there seemed no alternative but the Countess, whom, even if she liked as a companion, she feared as a woman, and could not bring herself to trust as a friend. She found herself daily approaching a period at which, as her exemplary sister-in-law had said, the care and tenderness of a female relative would be valuable and important, and saw no prospect of sympathy or consolation even in the distance. Worlds would she have given, if Mortimer could have been persuaded to accept Mrs. Farnham's offer of a visit. But no: that was interdicted, as she believed, at the Countess's suggestion, or, at least, with her perfect concurrence, — and why? Because Mrs. Farnham was too good and too devout. Strange reasons for keeping her apart from her sister-in-law, but so it was.

When her father first imparted to her his design of marrying again, Helen joyously acquiesced in all his views, thinking that by securing his own domestic comfort, he might bring into the domestic circle an agreeable companion and friend for herself. He had married; but although his part of the design might have been accomplished by his union with Mrs. Catling, his daughter's hopes were not likely to be realized by the connexion. The lady had nothing either in manner or character likely to attract Helen to her; and although she would have been delighted to make up a Christmas party at home, which might have included her father and the two ladies, rather than fulfil the engagement to the St. Almes, she feared that even a more intimate knowledge of their qualities would not in any great degree conduce to the increase of her esteem or affection for them.

She made an effort to stifle her grief, and proceeded to fulfil the duty assigned to her by her husband, of writing a worldly letter to the "dear Countess," setting forth, in the most affectionate phraseology, the happiness which the visit of her son would afford both Mortimer and herself; and, in fact, putting into conventional language, all that her husband had suggested.

When she had finished the despatch, she carried it to her lord and master, who was in the library. He was occupied in writing, and appeared somewhat confused by the sudden appearance of his lady; and with an abruptness meant to look purely accidental, contrived to cover, with other papers, the letter upon which he was sedulously employed. He might have left it as it was: neither idle curiosity, nor any anxious desire to know more than he chose to tell her, would have led Helen to question him as to the object of his labours. He took the task he had set her, and read it;

his eyes followed the lines across the his lip curled with a sneering smile of satisfaction ; how particularly excited, who watched every turn of his coun-could not exactly comprehend.

“What that do, dearest ?” said Helen, when finished.

“Miraculously, my dear Helen,” replied Mor-“you write with as true a semblance reality as you can act. Who would suppose that this cordial letter was the production of a young lady who, five minutes before she began to write it, suggested the utter rejection of her visiting list of the lady to whom it was addressed ?”

“I wrote, Mortimer, for myself,” said Helen ;
“I have written for you : — I may have expressed my feelings, my thoughts, and my wishes. I know it is my duty as a wife to repress them, but I do so in obedience to one whose judgment
I am supposed to be more matured than my own, and, above all, whose will in this house shall be law.”

“Believe me on my word ! Helen,” said Francis,

“ you are almost as good in Tragedy as in Comedy. I did not mean to vex you ; I merely made an observation generally applicable to the whole world.”

“ I am no actress,” said Helen. “ Heaven knows I never was accused of deceit or hypocrisy : still, still that hateful day and its events haunt your mind ! What object could I have had in all that affair but, at the Countess’s desire, to shield her from your anger.”

“ You are a dear, kind-hearted girl !” said Mortimer. “ I believe it ; but I still maintain that you should not have permitted her influence to supersede mine.”

“ Are we to begin again upon that subject ?” said Helen : “ I thought it was all ended and forgotten. The influence of the Countess is, I know, something irresistible, and affects others as deeply as even I have been affected by it.”

“ There, there,” said Mortimer, — “ I have done. I beg your pardon, Helen ! I know she is a very extraordinary woman, and you are quite right in writing thus kindly ; — but,”

l he, playfully, "you can't bear to be with."

seemed, by the manner in which Helen agitated by her husband's renewed reference to her "acting," placed in juxtaposition her "writing," that she and Mortimer formed very different opinions upon the act of joking. Such, indeed, was the effect produced by his abrupt and unexpected allusion to her "hypocrisy" upon the occasion of the meeting, that nothing could have prevented the "scene" but the timely announcement to Mortimer of a visiter in the person of the doctor, which terminated the dialogue, and gave Helen an opportunity of retiring from the library by an opposite door.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE reader may, perhaps, think that the frequent descriptions of scenes of this sort are unnecessary and uncalled for, inasmuch as their recurrence leads to no great result; but a moment's reflection may perhaps furnish an excuse, if not a reason, for placing them upon record, inasmuch as the conduct of Mortimer upon every occasion of the kind, exhibited to Helen in their true colours the character and disposition of her husband, disconnected from all the occurrences of his earlier life, as they existed at the moment; and that exhibition convinced her that never were two minds or tempers more diametrically opposed to each other than hers to his, or his to hers.

Helen, as we have seen, was always candid — except when, to her own self-abasement and mortification, she consented to “act” under the management of the Countess St. Alme. She was open-hearted, powerfully affected by passing circumstances, impassioned, and even violent in her passion; but the burst once over, and her heart relieved by the outbreak of its feelings, she was calm, placid, and content, and on the tablet of her memory there rested no mark of what had happened: if she had been right, she was satisfied; if she had been wrong, she satisfied herself by admitting her fault; but either right or wrong, she never felt either triumph or resentment beyond the moment. Such a heart, and such a mind, properly treated, would have ensured happiness to him who had, in fact, the first training of them in the world.

Mortimer, on the contrary, might forgive, but he never forgot. Subject, as we know, to fits of deep gloom, he was equally the victim of violent bursts of anger,—founded upon jealousy,—of himself, in the first instance: but when jealousy once gains ground and holds it, Heaven only can set bounds to its power and influence.

In these bursts of anger, all that had ever occurred at any period of his life in relation to the person their then present cause, flashed into his mind, and found utterance from his lips. He brooded over fancied injuries, and harboured the remembrance of them even though they had been long before explained away and expiated ; and whenever the chord was stricken which could awake their memory, no feeling of care or regard, either for himself or others, could restrain the reiteration of his often-repeated denunciations.

The reader will have seen that, from the moment the incident of the visit to the fishing-temple seized hold of his imagination, no adverse circumstance could occur, no trifling difference ever arise between himself and Helen, but that piece of duplicity was raked up to be thrown in her teeth.

Trifling, indeed, in point of fact, as that incident was, his perpetual recurrence to it irritated Helen more than she dared admit even to herself. “ I did err,” said Helen : “ it is true I did, under the influence of his friend ; but my heart was nearly broken by my error. I admitted,—I apologized for it:—apologized!—I implored pardon for it; and that pardon was granted, and sealed, as I hoped and believed, with a husband's kiss of love! I cannot bear a constant reference to it whenever the slightest difference of opinion arises between Francis and myself; and then, if I show how much I feel the cruelty of such conduct, I am told I am not fond of jesting!”

In five minutes after Helen left the library, Francis was as much vexed as she could be, that he had permitted himself again to allude to the event, and listened with the most patient inattention to the eloquent pleadings of the Rector in behalf of some deserving family, anxious only to get rid of him that he might seek out his wife and soothe the sorrow which, the moment reflection came to his aid, he felt assured his uncalled-for and unjustifiable allusions had occasioned her.

This repentance was all extremely good, and the desire to make atonement for an injury inflicted, just and honourable; but the negative course of not giving the pain he was so soon desirous of assuaging, would have been much more worthy, and infinitely more likely to secure the heart that he had made his own. Helen was yet but a young wife, and Helen regarded Mortimer with something amounting to awe. As time wears on, this may wear off; and if the tenderness of her affection shall become blunted by the rude shocks to which it seems likely to be subjected, the respect with which their relative situations, and even ages, might now inspire her, may perhaps be converted into some very different sentiment, and thus, divested of those restraints which she now imposes upon it, her temper may have its way. It is not, however, for us to anticipate.

It seemed, it must be admitted, a somewhat fortunate coincidence of circumstances, that, upon the day in question, before the Rector had brought his tale of woe to a conclusion, Colonel Magnus, the redoubtable, arrived at Sadgrove, and, as Mortimer grievously anticipated, accompanied by "a friend." The pair, if pair they could be called, were in-ounced and ushered into the library, where Magnus, having gone the length of honouring the Rector with permission to touch two of the fingers of his left hand, introduced his companion to Mortimer, whose astonishment, under all the circumstances, at beholding his person and hearing his name, was beyond anything that pen can adequately describe.

The Rector took his leave, and certainly he had no business in such company. It required at least three-quarters of an hour's explanation to satisfy Mortimer of the justice, expediency, or even the possibility, of finding the Colonel's companion a visiter at his house; at the end of which period, Magnus (they having retired for the purpose into Mortimer's own room) had thoroughly convinced him not only of the prudence and propriety, but of the absolute necessity, of bringing down to Sadgrove in his carriage no less a person than Mr. Brimmer Brassey, of Barnard's Inn, Gent.—one, &c.

The very fact of Mr. Brimmer Brassey's confidential connexion with Jacob Batley, putting aside all his personal disqualifications as an associate, was sufficient to disgust Mortimer with his visiter; and the other fact of his having been actively, sedulously, and successfully employed in defeating at Mudbury the claims and pretensions of Magnus himself, seemed to him to render the present confederacy dangerous, if not almost disgraceful. However, Magnus had that magnificent manner of pooh-poohing down all Mortimer's oppositions and remonstrances, and a despotic way of marching over all difficulties in a "Nec aspera terrent" style of magnanimity, that if he thought Mr. Brimmer Brassey essential to his extrication from difficulties, and if he employed him as his agent, Mortimer must necessarily admit that Mr. Brassey was everything that he ought to be; and Mortimer, really and truly succumbing to this influence, whatever his own personal prejudices against him might be, his hostility was at an end, and Mr. Brimmer Brassey was right welcome to Sadgrove.

It would be extremely improper, at present, so far to anticipate the future occurrences which we may have occasion in due time to notice, as to make any particular remarks upon the nature and character of this visit; but it seems as if the intelligence which Mr. Brassey had received with regard to the pecuniary connexion which existed between Magnus and Mortimer, and which, as the reader already knows, he communicated to Mr. Jacob Batley, was tolerably authentic. How far Jacob might have yielded to the disinterested suggestions of Mr. Brassey, as to playing with some of the "kites," (as he called them,) which were supposed to be flying about, and in how much he might have lent himself, or any part of his capital, to the temporary release of the embarrassed dandy, it is not for us just now to enquire; but it certainly does appear somewhat strange, that in so short a time, after having so strenuously opposed the gallant Colonel, and so successfully defeated him at Mudbury, Mr. Brassey should be found seated at his side under the roof of his most particular friend, with whom he had so recently made a sort of brief official acquaintance as the homme d'affaires of the man Jacob, whom he himself hated so cordially.

Everybody has seen how a character for low legal dexterity brings a man forward in certain circles. When talent in this line is discovered, money, of course, will buy it: prejudice or feeling does not influence it, — delicacy or consistency does not control it. You might as well charge a Conservative physician with inconsistency for curing a Radical patient, as a Radical lawyer with treachery for serving a Conservative cause; nay, the very fact that an electioneering attorney has, as he would call it, “done his best” for a Whig, to the utter discomfiture of a Tory, affords the strongest possible reason to the next Tory who wants to beat a Whig, for employing him. Magnus’s good opinion of Brassey’s talent was painfully established in the controversy at Mudbury, and his personal vanity strengthened this conviction of his ability; for, said Magnus, drawing himself up to his full height, “If the fellow could contrive to smash me, with all my personal and political character, in favour of person as Sir Christopher Hickathrift, rton Lodge, he must be something out mmon."

is feeling, and the consciousness that g must be done further to relieve his s, which any person of greater respect- n the profession than Mr. Brimmer would hesitate to do, may safely be at- the employment upon the present occa- ie worthy in the black velvet waiscoat. e you heard from your father-in-law, d Brassey to Mortimer, "since his

' said Mortimer, nearly paralyzed by tion and the manner in which it was Mrs. Mortimer, I believe, has."

indeed!" said Brassey,— "I suppose e seems to me to be a very affectionate . I hope Mrs. M. is quite well."

e well, thank you," said Francis, with 'look."

ed you at the wedding, sir," continued

"very nice party. The Bishop is a very charming man, — very nice, and the housemaids looked uncommon pretty. — Miss J. is a nice young woman, — don't you think so?"

"Miss — ?" asked Mortimer.

"Mrs. J. B.'s sister," continued Brassey : —
"very nice young woman indeed, — she is a common spry, — rather Hibernian, — but there's no fault, in my mind : — sweetly lively. I think she would make a very pretty partner for a well-disposed young man in a good line of business."

Mortimer stared, and so did Magnus : they bowed their heads slightly, and Magnus took a very large pinch of snuff.

"Pray, sir," said Magnus, looking particularly dignified, "when shall we be able to proceed in our business? I opened the particulars to Mr. Mortimer in the next room : he knows that" —

"Why," said Brassey, "in a day or two I shall be able to make something like a calculation. I hope by Saturday or Monday to give you an outline of the terms and conditions."

“Saturday or Monday!” said Mortimer, in a tone of despondency; — “not before Saturday or Monday?”

“I think not,” said Brassey. “I shall have to communicate with my clerk in town; and then the insurance; and then”——

“Oh! well, well,” said Mortimer, “I don’t mean to hurry on the affair; and I hope you will make yourself at home while we have the pleasure of your company here. I only”——

“Never fear, Mr. M.” said Brassey. “I have a rule for staying at country-houses, — ten miles a-day, sir. Go ten miles, — dine, sleep, and breakfast; twenty miles, — stay two days, ditto; thirty, — three days; and so on: we are about a hundred and twenty-four from London, which makes ten days and the eleventh morning about the cut, — eh? — ha! ha! ha!”

“I fancy in ten days,” said Mortimer, “we shall be on the other side of the water.”

“What!” said Brassey, “the Colonel, — eh? — in Banco? — ha, ha, ha! Oh! no, Mr. M. we must keep him out of that if we possibly can.”

The look which Magnus threw across the room at Mortimer was furious beyond measure.

"I hope," said Magnus, "that two or three days will bring our affair to a termination."

"I fear not," said Brassy: "I have to deal with queer old codgers. If I had the money myself, you shouldn't be plagued five hours about it; but, as I say, the men who haven't got the money are plaguy liberal: those who have, like it too well to part with it,—what I call slap-dash off-hand—ha, ha!"

"Well," said Mortimer, "as we can proceed no further to-day, perhaps you would like to be shown your room, Mr. Brassy: Magnus, you are at home: I will ring and enquire what room is assigned to your friend."

"You are very kind, Mr. M.," said Brassy,—"very kind, indeed, sir! Ah! if only we could thump a little of your liberality into your old uncle."

"Uncle!" said Mortimer, opening his large eloquent eyes, "I have no uncle, sir."

"Not uncle Jacob?" said Brassy, "oh, yes."

“ Oh ! ”——

“ There’s a vast deal of good in him, sir,” said Brassey: “ uncommon fond of the stumpy, — that’s true: he likes his own way as much as anybody I ever saw. The proverb says, ‘ where there’s a will there’s a way ; ’ — your father-in-law should recollect that where there’s a way there’s a will. He should study his brother’s humours and fancies — that’s all, sir. He is easily led; but the Old Gentleman with the hoofs and the horns, and the tail, — you’ll excuse my mentioning his name,— cannot drive him.”

Mortimer, who had carefully avoided any allusion to the last shabby trick which Jacob had played upon his brother Jack, was particularly desirous of cutting the conversation short at present, fully aware of the sort of evening that was in perspective, and wishing, if possible, to leave Mr. Brassey that period for the display of his eloquence, convinced that his evident readiness to talk, would be considerably excited by the wine which he felt certain he would swallow; being moreover anxious to make his peace with Helen before dinner, lest her serenity might be ruffled, and her appearance indicate a state of affairs which, as he was assured in his own mind that everything the attorney saw would be reported to her uncle, he least of all desired.

Mortimer even yet did not know or appreciate Helen's temper. He sought and found her: no lurking frown contracted her brow; no pouting lip proclaimed a "lingering grudge:" all that had occurred when they last met had, as usual, passed from her mind; and when she saw her husband approaching her, with a countenance neither in sorrow nor in anger, but lighted up with an expression of good-humour blended with what might be called "comic distress," caused by the unexpected arrival of Mr. Brassey, she ran towards him, charmed to see him pleased and animated, and anxious to know who Magnus's companion was; for although the arrival of the Colonel had been announced to her by her maid, nobody seemed exactly to know the name of the little gentleman in the black velvet waistcoat, who came with a carpet-bag, and had no servant."

"What on earth can he be come for?" said Helen.

"Ay, there it is," said Mortimer; "that is one of our secrets."

Does not the reader perceive in this trifling observation the still-existing disposition which was perpetually vexing Helen. True, Mortimer was playful, kind, and good-humoured; but even in his gaiety and playfulness and good-humour he could not omit to remind her that the words she had used in some previous conversation were treasured in his memory.

"Oh! then," said Helen, "I shall enquire no more about him. Has he heard from Papa?"

"I never asked him," said Mortimer, "although he asked me if I had heard? In fact, the business he is here upon, is so totally disconnected from any concern of ours, — I mean as relates to the family, — that it did not strike me. It is necessary, for the sake of my friend Magnus, to be civil to him, but that is all."

Helen felt that she would give the world, if she had it, not to dine at table with the new guests, and felt, moreover, a sort of desolation in having no female friend or companion, even upon ordinary occasions like this, not to speak of the more important circumstances which we have before noticed.

The party did not meet until just before the second bell had been rung, and Brassey, never having visited Sadgrove before, (and his being there then was certainly one of those surprising things which much oftener happen in society than people imagine,) blundered about the lobbies and passages, and having, after many "bad shots" at different doors and corridors, found his way to the head of the principal staircase, followed his nose down into the hall, and was saved all further trouble and difficulty by the groom of the chambers, who opened the door of the small drawing-room in which people usually assembled before dinner. This act of civility being performed by somebody so much more like a gentleman than himself, or any of the bodies with whom he was in the habit of associating, produced not only one of Brimmer Brassey's smartest bows, but when Jenkins stood with the door in his hand to usher him in, provoked the still more polite address of "Oh! dear, after you, sir!"

This mistake may be considered by some a gaucherie of the first order; but looking round the world, whatever may be one's inherent respect for high blood, it must be confessed that upon many occasions and in many instances the democracy of the second table have very much the personal advantage of the aristocracy of the first: and it did once happen to the narrator of this small history, at a party at which the attendance of blue coats and white waistcoats was profuse, to send a gentleman so clothed, three or four times, for soup, lobster-salad, jellies, and other nourishing supports, the absolute necessities of life for ladies after dancing, until at length, having borne with ineffable good-nature the toils which he felt conscious were inflicted on him unintentionally and by mistake, and in the "service of the fair," the aforesaid gentleman, upon a fifth demand, delivered in the ordinary tone of—"Here, sir, get this lady some Macedoine,"—quietly turned to the narrator, and said,—“No, no: I have got all you asked me to get for your friends five times; now it is time I should get something for myself.” It is needless to add, (as the jest-books say,) that your narrator was absolutely annihilated, —stammered an apology, the more difficult to make as what had previously happened, practically inferred his belief that the suffering gentleman was, in fact, a servant. The suffering gentleman, however, seemed perfectly aware of the mutual embarrassment, and behaved very like a gentleman who did not deserve to suffer by taking his seat next the narrator, and proving his claim to “guestship” by finishing with the said narrator at least one bottle of champagne, not to speak of the moral to the fable in the shape of two verdant, spiry glasses of Roman punch, which the Cockneys, to show their learning, think it right invariably to translate into “ponche à la Romaine,” believing, to a certain extent, that it was invented by the late eminent preacher of that name,— and more shame for him !

Having reached, to him, the terra incognita of the small drawing-room, Mr. Brimmer Brassey found himself entirely alone; his active punctuality having brought him to the ground rather before any other one of the very small family party with which he was destined to pass the day. He looked at everything he saw with extreme curiosity; but at himself in the glass over the fire-place with the greatest satisfaction; still there dwelt upon his mind a sort of embarrassing doubt why the very elegant gentleman who had given him precedence did not join him in the room. At length Mortimer himself arrived, and relieved him from the embarrassment of being alone, which is said to be, to a certain class of legal practitioners, a most disagreeable circumstance.

Mortimer, whose manners were, when he chose, agreeable almost to fascination, felt it his duty, hating Brassey as he did when he before encountered him, to put him perfectly at his ease in his own house, and immediately on joining him began to inquire of him whether he shot with caps or flints, regretting that, it being late in the season, he was afraid he could not give him quite such sport as he would have had if he had favoured him earlier; hoped that Mr. Blocksford, a young friend of his, would be down to-morrow evening, and that they might have some tolerable amusement on the following day; and, in short, exhibited himself under the roof of Sadgrove in a character so different from that in which he had appeared at Batley's in London, that Brimmer was completely astounded. If he had been told that he was duped, deceived, or, as he would himself have said, "humbugged," by the specious flattery of his host, he would have angrily denied the imputation. The fact is, that Mortimer was a gentleman, and under whatever circumstances a guest once passed his threshold, his feeling, his taste, and his tact were, to put that individual upon a perfect equality with the rest of his visitors; in fact, the smaller the legitimate pretensions of that more particular was his attention, in bringing him to the general level of the here existing society.

the elegant gentleman whose society Brassey so deplored, threw open for the admission of Mrs. Mortimer, he was as much astounded at what was evidently his mistake, as he was at the appearance of the lady of the house. He was good-naturedly to him; but his wish was, to be exceedingly polite to her. He did not exactly know how to achieve this; but his first attempt was reasonably made in reference to the events of "yesterday's" wedding: a mild, placid reception of something which he meant to be face-saving. He stopped his further efforts in that way: a subsequent sudden turn-round, from a whisper which might have done remark-able for the wives and sisters of the members of the "Slap-bang" club, which Helen was in the favour of Colonel Magnus, (whom she cordially disliked, but who was, at all events, under all circumstances, incomparable with Mr. Brassey in every point of view,) left Mr. Brassey looking excessively uncomfortable.

Dinner was announced, and Mrs. Mortimer took the Colonel's arm, — Mortimer bowing to Brassey, who, in the excess of his civility, said, as he had already said to the groom of the chamber, "After you, sir," a difficulty which Mortimer got rid of by clapping him on the shoulder and pushing him before him, in order to let the servants suppose that his ignorance was merely affected, and that he was a particular friend of the house; it being, as we have already said, his invariable rule to put up the man who most needed putting up.

The party consisted of only the four, and nothing could be more dull. At dinner, of course, Magnus sat on Helen's right hand, and the attorney of Barnard's Inn on her left. In pursuance of his established principle, Mortimer paid him every due and undue attention. While under the excitement occasioned by handing about the entrees, Brassey was somewhat subdued; and his astonishment when Mrs. Mortimer put the carte before him was by no means small. Mortimer's cook was a cordons bleu, who piqued himself not only upon the variety of his dishes, but upon their novelty both of name and nature; but Brassey, who had never seen a carte placed upon a table, except, indeed, a carte à payer, was terribly confused, — first, by its appearance generally, and then by its contents particularly: and although he collected, — which, with his quickness, it was natural he should do, — that the paper described what there was to be eaten, the difficulty lay, not only in choosing between dishes, the characters and qualities of which he did not understand, but in pronouncing the names which custom or the cook had assigned them. However, the infernally persevering assiduity of servants, who offer everything that ever was put down upon a table to everybody who sits round it, released him from his embarrassment that way, and after half an hour, and a few glasses of champagne, Mr. Brimmer

Brassey became almost as vivacious and as much at his ease as he represented himself always to be at the "Slap-bang" club.

Things went on tolerably well till dinner was over, and, luckily, all the servants were gone, except the butler, whom, by a mistaken notion of saving his guests trouble in putting round the wine, Mortimer retained in the room. Now, of all men in the world, Mortimer being the most particular as to the character of the conversation which took place after dinner at his table, one would have thought would have been the last to adopt, and the first to discard, the melancholy restraint which is imposed upon society by the double-refined invention of keeping servants in waiting to pass the bottles. If there be a moment of the day in which men unboresom themselves, no matter upon what subject, it is in the hour, or even half hour, (if custom and fashion so say,) after dinner: and if anything can kill and entirely ruin and damnify the genial interchange of feeling and sentiment, the confidential avowal of opinions upon men.

and things, for which the said hour or half hour seems to be the season, it is the presence of a circumambulating menial, who derives the only satisfaction which recompenses him for his trouble, from listening to the conversation, of which, however discreet he may be in the use of his knowledge, he becomes perfectly master, and which is left completely at his disposal, either for love or money, as the case may be.

Mr. Brimmer Brassey, in the outset, had been confused and worried, but he bore his infliction well. It is true, he ate mustard with his Soufflet, and covered his Fondu with sugar ; but he joked and laughed and went on upon the only subject of which he knew anything which could interest Mrs. Mortimer. All he talked about, was the wedding,—and the bride, and Miss Fitz-Flannery,—and the Bishop,—and his great delight at having sat next a Bishop at the déjeuner ;—“ he had no idea what pleasant people Bishops were : ” — which most luminous remark, followed by a loud Ha, ha, ha ! gave Helen the strongest possible indication that the period was rapidly approaching at which she ought to retire.

This she accordingly prepared to do, but, as she was rising from her chair to leave the room, Mr. Brimmer Brassey, gallant beyond her warmest hopes, jumped up, and exclaimed in a sort of mock heroic manner, "Oh! Mrs. M. don't run away from us, ~~get up~~!"

The awful silence with which Mortimer and Magnus, the aristocratic Gog and Magog of Sadgrove, received this little bit of liveliness, fell heavily upon Brassey's heart; and when Mrs. Mortimer, without taking the slightest notice of the attorney's "Slap-bang" civility, made a sign to Mortimer that she should not expect him in the drawing-room, Magnus gave an approving nod to the suggestion.

"Come, sir," said Mortimer — "Magnus, come up. I assure you the nights get cold: we'll have some logs put on the top of these coals, and draw round the fire. Now, Mr. Brassey, don't you think that will be more snug and comfortable?"

Brassey had not as yet been long enough in the house to form any distinct idea of "snug and comfortable;" nay, such was his innocence that, totally unprepared for being marshalled to his chamber, his small mind was at present employed in considering (charged with champagne as it already was) how he should get to bed; and yet, such are the extraordinary circumstances of human life, or rather of modern society, that this man, who lived in a sort of terror during his temporary exaltation, was considered worthy to be made the associate of those who endured his presence merely because he was necessary to one of them as a means of saving his — pecuniary reputation.

Mortimer having, by one of those conventional signs which exist, and will, we hope, for ever exist between men and their wives, ascertained from Helen that, as she should not expect them, she would go quietly to bed, felt no inclination to balk Mr. Brassey's evident disposition to sit and drink for any given time and of any given quantity. The object of Magnus, as it may easily be conceived, was to gratify him to the fullest extent; and so Mortimer, whose convivial qualities, at least as far as an active participation in Bacchanalian revels went, were extremely limited, desired Jenkins to bring a particular sort of claret; having obeyed which order, he was dismissed from further attendance.

The claret was excellent, and Mr. Brassey swallowed it; and if the Severn itself had flowed in such a "regal purple stream," he would have gone on drinking it so long as he could sit. That period, however, was past long before even his host expected the downfall; for after having assured both Mortimer and Magnus that the business he had in hand would succeed; after having pronounced Mrs. Mortimer a charming woman, and gone the length of smacking the back of Colonel Magnus, and proclaiming him a devilish fine fellow, he suddenly lost his balance and measured his shortness on the carpet, whence he was carried to bed in a state of glorious insensibility, not much more perfect than might have been expected after witnessing his laudable exertions in imbibition.

At breakfast in the morning he did not show. To Helen this did not give any particular uneasiness. Mortimer had not only ordered every attention to be paid him, but had visited him himself: the symptoms of his complaint were not such as to excite any alarm, the greater part of his disorder appearing to arise from the lately-arrived conviction that he had exceeded his usual quantum.

When he himself awoke to a consciousness of his real position, his dread and apprehension were great, lest he had permitted the real object of his solicitude, or rather that of his client, to be of use in relieving Colonel Magnus from his difficulties, — difficulties of a nature so intricate and peculiar, that nothing but an almost immediate supply of ready money could rescue his property from ruin, — to have escaped him, during the discussions of the previous night.

Nothing can be more dreadful than the uncertainty in which a man who has, accidentally or incidentally, as was the case in this instance, drank so much of claret or any other stronger potation, wakes in the morning, as to what has happened the night before. In point of fact, the visit of Mr. Brimmer Brassey was, — harmless as it seemed, — fraught with the ruin of more than one man of the party present; and, from what has already been noticed of the character of this “Gent. — one,” &c. it may easily be imagined, that when the point to be gained was important, he would not stick at trifles.

Is it not strange, — for this he did not know when he woke, — that during all the oddities, absurdities, and vulgarities of which he was guilty, until, unable to remove himself, he was literally carried from the dinner-table to his bed-room, not one allusion did he make to the business upon which he came down to Sadgrove; not one reference to his client, — (or, as he sometimes called him, his principal;) nor did the smallest hint escape him touching the name, character, or circumstances of that client. Does not this lead us to believe that men have two minds, — an outer mind and an inner mind? Statesmen get drunk, — at least, they did before these no-drinking days ; (some probably indulge even now :) and yet the hilarity of the convivial evening never seems to affect the ministerial recesses of the brain. There never was, that we know of, an instance of a cabinet secret slipping out, tipsy soever as might have been any member of that important conclave.

Certain it is, that whenever Magnus or Mortimer endeavoured to draw Brassey to the point which alone interested them, after he had finished his second bottle, he evaded it altogether, or touched upon it with as much caution as he would have exhibited before he had tasted his first spoonful of soup in the outset of dinner ; nay, not five minutes before he tumbled off his chair, with which feat the entertainments of the evening concluded, he was descanting with the most pertinacious propriety as to the precise value of a stamp necessary to a certain deed which had accidentally become the subject of conversation.

Little, however, did Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer anticipate the results of Mr. Brassey's agreeable dissipation. As the day wore on, and the attorney did not put in his appearance, the master of Sadgrove directed his man to visit him, and enquire whether he would like anything in the way of luncheon, or, as he privately added, — medicine. But no: all was in vain: — no remedies they could afford, or he apply, could stop the fiat which Nature had issued. The blow had fallen; Nature had issued a writ of ca. sa.; and Mr. Brimmer Brassey was relieved from all other worldly ills by the unquestionable commencement of a fit of the gout.

“The gentleman is very bad, sir,” said the servant, who had returned from the visit.

“Magnus,” said Mortimer, “your friend has got the gout.”

“The gout!” said Magnus: “what’s to be done?”

“The gentleman says,” continued the man, who seemed to possess the universal failing of all servants, — the desire to make everything appear as bad as possible, and to lay all manner of blame upon people who make visits to country-houses with a carpet-bag instead of a valet, — “the gentleman says he is afraid it is one of his periodical fits, which generally lay him up for a month or six weeks; and his doctor never permits him to check them.”

“Well,” said Mortimer, “I will go up to him myself.”

The servant withdrew.

“This is one of the most agreeable incidents that ever occurred,” said Francis.

“Yes,” said Magnus, “and to me most particularly delightful, inasmuch as it not only puts a dead stop to our business, but leaves on my shoulders the onus of having brought the little fellow here: in fact, the inconvenience which it may occasion me is but a secondary consideration.”

“There is no inconvenience to us in the matter,” said Mortimer. “There is his room; I will send for our apothecary, assign him a servant to attend to his wishes, and eventually leave him in possession of Sadgrove, if the fit should hold until we take our departure for France.”

which had occurred : on the tient was his guest, and the and accordingly the gracious to his room to offer all the con-and take his pleasure as to wish to have done with respectional business.

Brassey was all gratitude miserable of men. It had been sary to confide to the footman he had been consigned, the "luggage bag," which contained so many shirts, stockings, &c. as to mical character of his wardrobe as he would have said, of with holes in them for his evidence of the superfluity

razor, tied with a piece of red tape to a round pewter shaving-box, (enclosing a bit of soap,) with the top of its handle peeping from the bottom of a leathern case, like the feet of a long-legged Lilliputian sticking out of his coffin; a remarkably dirty flannel under waistcoat, edged with light blue silk and silver; one pair of black silk socks, brown in the bottoms; an ill-corked bottle half full of "Russia oil;" a very suspicious-looking wiry hair-brush, and one shaving ditto, were amongst the most striking items of the omnium gatherum: Pandora's box, or the green bag of more recent celebrity, could not have contained so much of mischief to anybody in the world as this carpet envelope of Mr. Brimmer Brassey produced to him.

Talk of the gout!—it was nothing to the pain which this involuntary exposition of his private affairs occasioned; although, in truth, as Strephon says, the gout had nothing to do with the disclosure, for it was while he was insensible to the things of this world that the man had opened the "bag," in order to hunt for the various articles of drapery which he considered necessary to establish him for the night, and who, with a mixture of attentive civility and méchanceté, had taken the trouble to lay out and spread on the table in the adjoining dressing-room, all the articles which it appeared, Mr. Brimmer Brassey deemed essential to his personal comfort.

There were, however, greater difficulties in the way than at the first blush of the misadventure presented themselves to view. However active the mind of the man of business might remain under his bodily sufferings, it was clear that the body itself was immoveable. That part of his duty which, as it seemed, involved the attendance of a surveyor, was, of course, impracticable; and the fact that his correspondence with his client must pass through intermediate hands in its way to the Post-office, rendered it necessary that he should enclose the communications he had to make to his own clerk, a person of matured years, and by some imagined to be the parent of his respectable employer. Even the great Lord

Chesterfield's unquestionable dictum, that gout is the gentleman's complaint, while rheumatism is distinctive of hackney-coachmen, could not reconcile him to the embarrassment in which he found himself involved; and yet he dared not set the matter at rest by an appeal to Wilson, Husson, Colchicum, and Co. — inasmuch as (as, indeed, the servant had reported) Dr. Doddle, his own physician, had pronounced sudden death the inevitable consequence of any such violent application.

“Of course,” said Magnus, when they returned to the library, “we must not kill the man; because one might have some qualms of conscience afterwards; but I really think that it would be more advisable to try some other channel through which our matters might be managed.”

“If it does not press imperatively,” said Mortimer, “I should advise you to keep things still where they are: every fresh attempt opens the business in a new quarter; and if, as you seem to think, this will answer your purpose eventually, you shall not, my dear Magnus, be inconvenienced by any temporary pressure."

"No, Mortimer, I will not hear of this," said Magnus. "With a fortune like mine, and an influence the extent of which you know, it seems absurd to be gêne'd in the smallest degree: but West-Indian property has been so entirely demolished by the saintly white-washers of Aldermanbury, that if it had not been for the compensation which they gave me for that which they had rendered utterly valueless before, I should have been, as far as that source is concerned, completely gravelled. Now, the object I have"—

"My dear Magnus, say no more," interrupted Francis. "The plain fact is, you want money at the moment; at the moment it is within your reach, an unexpected event occurs which draws it away from you:—come into my room; let me sign a cheque on my banker, and you fill it up to the amount you require for present use, limiting yourself only to a sum which you think the worthy Sir Anthony, — than whom there never lived a better man, — will honour by draft.”

“My dear Mortimer,” said Magnus, “you are a noble-hearted fellow, and the kindest of friends! This is not the first time I have profited by your generosity; and although, I declare to you, it is most painful to me to” —

—“There, there, my dear Magnus,” said Mortimer, “you shall tell me all the particulars hereafter. Come, — come along, and do what I desire.”

And suiting the action to the word, he led, or rather gently drove him into his room, where, according to his friendly solicitation, Magnus mentioned two thousand five hundred pounds as the ultimatum of his temporary necessities.

By dinner-time the Doctor had pronounced Mr. Brassey's fit to be decided; everything was going on well; nothing but time, patience, and flannel, were now requisite. If by an additional quantity of the latter article the proportions of the two former could have been diminished, then Mortimer would probably have felt extremely pleased ; but evils that cannot be cured must be endured, and therefore, applying an admixture of good-breeding and philosophy to the case, Mr. Brimmer Brassey was desired to ask for everything he wished, and to order what he pleased ; and at a quarter before ten o'clock, Colonel Magnus, having had a long audience of leave of his " legal adviser," took his departure from Sadgrove, bearing with him what was to be considered merely an advance on account of the larger sum which Brimmer Brassey was eventually to procure.

There is something in the succession of visitors at a country-house which produces a mingled sensation of pleasure and pain. The gratification arising from what may be called a " fresh infusion," is sometimes counterbalanced by the regret at losing an agreeable companion ; and it sometimes happens, when the visit does not exceed a week, that it is not until the fourth or fifth day of it, that one gets really to like the individual who is des-timed to go on the seventh ; because, in point of fact, people know nothing in the world of each other who merely meet in London society. There do, of course, exist friendships, especially between women, in London, but those have been grounded and established either by family connexions, or early association : but it is only by the constant intercourse—the juxtaposition produced by the joyous, unstarched (as Helen would have said) intercourse of a country-house, that the real qualities of mind, and temper especially, can be tested.

A ship is avowedly the strongest trial of all : a modern writer has said, that “ he that cannot eat anything, dressed in any way, at any time, out of anything, and this under the sight of any dirt, the effect of any smell, the sound of any discord, and the feeling of any motion, ought not to go to sea.”

This is rather shooting beyond the mark ; because in the sort of ship to which we should refer for an illustration of our principle, the fare would be excellent. The sounds,—probably from the captain’s band,—harmonious ;

the smell, fragrance,—probably from the captain's pastiles; and the cleanliness unquestionable, from the customs of the service. What we allude to is, the close confinement in juxtaposition of some twenty or thirty persons who, by the very circumstances of the voyage, and their entire removal from the “pressure without” of any vexations, mortifications, envies, hatreds, fears, or hopes, beyond the wooden walls of the huge box in which they are packed, are thrown upon their own resources, and have all their feelings and passions pemmicaned into that small compass.

It is universally observable, that the greatest object of excitement on board ship, next to the favour of the lady-passengers, is the cuisine; and it is wonderful to see how the magnificent mind of man, in its beautiful elasticity, can devote itself and all its energies to so small a point: but no matter whether it be love or a leg of mutton, affection or apricot-tart, kindness or kidneys, as the case may be, the tempers and passions of the people boxed up, develop themselves in a most remarkable manner. In a country-house, although the interest takes a different direction, the intercourse comes generally to the same point; and a few weeks' domestication teaches us to esteem and love as friends those whom we scarcely liked in general society; and instructs us sometimes to shun the bad tempers and evil dispositions of those who in the circles of the season we have fancied the most amiable and kindest-hearted folks in the world.

Scarcely had the wheels of Colonel Magnus's departing carriage ground the gravel in front of Sadgrove Hall, before the light britscha of Mr. Francis Blocksford was whisked up to it. The person and manner of Magnus did not offer a stronger or more striking contrast to those of Blocksford, than did the arrival of the animated, youthful Blocksford to the departure of Magnus. Magnus, with a look fixed as marble, a pace which might well have suited the march of an emperor to his throne, gravely, grandly, and gracefully stepped into a remarkably low, large, heavy chariot, covered with caps, tops, imperials, &c.; having below it, a well of vast dimensions, leathern-covered chains, drags, and all the paraphernalia of extensive travelling, and which four horses found quite enough to do to move off with, at a decent pace. Blocksford, in his light, open carriage, — December as it had just begun to be, — with a pair of rattling nags, skimmed along the road, and—hear it not!—with a cigar still smoking in his mouth, leaped from his seat, dashed away his burning comfort, and, running up the steps of the house, bounced into the presence of his host and hostess, and stood before them

“ Like Mercury new lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.”

“ Ah! Francis,” said Helen, jumping from her chair with unaffected pleasure at his unexpected arrival, — for at the moment it was unexpected, — “ how glad I am to see you!”

They shook hands; and I believe, by the motion of his head, or body, or arm, Blocksford implied the possibility of her conferring a mark of friendship upon him which, in France, he had been taught to consider "nothing at all:" nor am I quite sure that Helen, who really liked him, and who scarcely knew whether he had quite outgrown his boyish privilege, did not look as if she did not think it would have been dreadfully indecorous to have given him so cordial a welcome: nor is it quite clear that the interrogative look which she gave Mortimer, while all these things were flashing through her mind, might not have in one instant curdled his temper, and induced, on his part, the coldest acknowledgment of Francis's warm enquiries after his health. He certainly did shake hands with him, but his manner of doing so struck to the heart of his wife, not perhaps so much on account of poor young Blocksford, whose countenance betrayed no feeling of vexation at the way he was received, as on her own. She saw she had transgressed, and although she could forget, in one sense of the word, she could not, in another, cease to remember the manner in which her husband had before alluded to her having the task of entertaining the son of his oldest friend, if he arrived during the stay of Colonel Magnus and his companion.

Young Blocksford, checked in his natural vivacity by his reception, looked to Helen as if for some explanation. Mortimer never turned his eyes towards his wife.

“Have you dined, Mr. Blocksford?” said he, without moving a feature of his face.

“Oh! yes,” said Francis; “I thought you would have done dinner before I could possibly get here, so I dined at Worcester. I don’t know how it is, but my mother kept me so long waiting for her commissions, that I did not get away from Cheltenham till near four o’clock. I have got lots of letters and books for you, dear Mrs. Mortimer, and a whole heap of loves and remembrances, and affections and regards.”

“Helen,” said Mortimer, without seeming to pay any particular attention to the speech of his young friend, “perhaps Francis would like some tea: we will go into the drawing-room when you send for us.”

Helen rose; Francis Blocksford rose too, to open the door. Mortimer rang the bell. Helen felt all that was passing in her husband's mind, and was ashamed — not of herself.

END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

LONDON:
PRINTED BY SAMUEL BENTLEY,
Dorset Street, Fleet Street.

BIRTHS,
DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF
"SAYINGS & DOINGS;" "MAXWELL;" "JACK BRAG;"
&c.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

LONDON: RICHARD BENTLEY, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

1839.

1. The first part of the document is a list of names and dates, arranged in a table-like format. The names are written in a cursive script, and the dates are in a standard font. The list is organized into two columns, with names on the left and dates on the right. The names are: John Smith, Jane Doe, and Robert Johnson. The dates are: 1890, 1891, and 1892. The list is followed by a section of text that is mostly illegible due to the quality of the scan.

BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

CHAPTER I.

THINGS seem to go crossly at Sadgrove. It appeared that one permanent and, as it were, constitutional feeling, wholly occupied the mind of Mortimer; and that anything,—no matter what,—which irritated or provoked him, acted immediately upon that one feeling. The first thing that had worried him during the day was, the sudden fit of the attorney; the second, Magnus's acceptance of his proffered aid: the rest was made up of little contradictions on the part of Helen, and two or three domestic disagreements with tenants and servants, all tending to keep his bile in motion; and when he saw, at the close of his day of worries, the reception his wife gave Francis Blocksford, the train was fired, and we have been told the result.

Now, if the reader should have become in any degree interested in this narrative, it is but natural to suppose that he might wish to hear how the attorney got through his gout; how long he stayed at Sadgrove; how Mortimer endured the society of Frank Blocksford for the next two days; when Jack Batley and his bride came to Sadgrove; and when the St. Almes went to France; together with sundry other results of foregone beginnings, "with many things of worthy memory which now shall die in oblivion, and," as Grumio sayeth, "he return unexperienced to his grave."

In the conduct of my story, the reader will please to observe, that at this moment two years and a-half have elapsed since the day of Mr. Brimmer Brassey's attack of the gout:—two years and a-half and more have flown during the interval between his laying down my second volume and opening my third, and that therefore, instead of dwelling upon events and occurrences which this hiatus renders comparatively remote, he must be prepared to find himself — at Sadgrove, it is true — its inmates being under very different circumstances from those in which he last saw them, — placed in different positions, — fulfilling new duties, and exerting and obeying new influences.

I have already said, that it was my intention at some particular period of this history to let the characters of the drama speak for themselves. That period has arrived; and I know no better method of enlightening the reader as to what has occurred during the past two years and a-half, and the now actual state of affairs, “men and things,” as regards the Mortimer family, than putting at his disposal the contents of the letter-box of Sadgrove Hall, as they were prepared for despatch on a particular day in the month of April, when a select party was assembled under its hospitable roof for the purpose of passing the Easter holidays.

Upon these authentic documents comment is needless. A country-house is the world's epitome, as everybody knows. Here is the box: and as one who was loved living and is lamented dead, was wont to say, "the thing speaks for itself."

It may perhaps be necessary to enumerate the persons from whose pens the position of affairs is to be judged. The party consisted of, besides Mortimer and Helen, Mr. Francis Blocksford, Lord Harry Martingale, a regular periodical visiter; Lady Mary, as before; old Lady Bembridge and her niece, (still Miss Rouncivall;) Captain Harvie, Mr. Pash, a millionaire and gourmand déterminé; and, professionally, for two days, again, Mr. Brimmer Brassey,—a circumstance worthy of remark as indicative of the gradual influence attainable on the score of business by such personages.

The under-plot, as it may be considered, — that is to say, the correspondence of the second table, was carried on by Miss Mitcham, Mrs. Mortimer's maid; Mr. Swing, Lord Harry's man; Mr. Fisher, the cook; Wilkins, Mormost trusty right-hand adviser; and other persons in the "domestic" line.

 g thus presented the characters, open box, taking the letters promiscuously come.

No. I.

MR. MORTIMER TO JOHN BATLEY, ESQ.

GROSVENOR STREET.

MR FATHER, Sadgrove, April 3, 18—.

I am not satisfied with the accounts of your health, nor do I think Teresa at her ease about you. It is all perhaps and just, and, as we know, quite ; with the customs of society, to submit the advice of a physician of eminence suggesting the propriety or necessity
 ; in any other assistance; but if you have not an unbounded confidence, or any question as to the accuracy of of your complaint, all such punctilios are overlooked. I really do wish — if I were where I was three years and a-half ago I think I should succeed in enforcing the wish — that you would send for somebody else, — of course, not without mentioning your intention to Dr. Z. : — nothing would be in worse taste than to attempt concealment from him of your proceeding, not to speak of the duplicity which it would involve. Let us do whatever we may consider just, or even best, for ourselves, but let it be done openly and fairly : disguises and contrivances and deceptions I cannot endure ; and certain I am, if he be the sort of person I have always heard him represented, considering the place he holds in his profession, that he will feel no illiberal jealousy if you suggest calling in additional advice. Do, dearest father, for my sake, — for Teresa's sake, — for your own sake, (and I put that last, because I am sure you care more for me and Teresa than for yourself,) — do what I ask.

“ You may easily imagine with such unsatisfactory accounts from you, how irksome and painful the effort to be gay here is. I am fully worried by my visitors, who, for most part, are not altogether after my heart: Lady Bembridge does not improve age, and her niece is anything but agreeable at least in my opinion: what I think of Mary you already know; but as she and Lord Harry are not only old friends of my mother's but of each other, they are to be here as regularly as the recurring moon.

Mr. Pash, a new ally of Mortimer's, — for particular merit or virtue I have not been able to discover, — is intolerably vulgar, talks and laughs loud at what he himself has said. He wastes one-half of his time in descanting upon cookery, and the other half in eating the 'crackles' upon which he has previously lectured. One of his favourite morning strolls being to the kitchen to enquire of Mr. Fisher, our cook, how the carte is to be varied for the day, and even to instruct him in the construction of certain peculiar dishes, his principal merit and boast being, that he has given me in Ude's book to some 'Sauce à-la-

Pash,' which has been pronounced impayable even in Arlington Street.

“ There are degrees and gradations in everything, and Mr. Pash is preserved from my denunciation as the most odious person I ever saw, by the unexpected presence, — for but a short time, I trust, — of Mr. Brassey, my uncle's attorney : of course, I have no right to say one word to Mortimer upon matters with which I can have nothing to do, and about which he must know so much more than I can ; but there is something about Mr. Brassey, totally apart from his assurance and vulgarity, which makes me dread his presence. Knowing, as we do, the implicit reliance that my uncle Jacob has upon him, and knowing how implacable his hatred for Mortimer is, I cannot disconnect in my mind the object of his visits here with some plan to annoy or embarrass my husband ; for I know so much as to be convinced, that while Mr. Brassey is occupied with Mortimer about Colonel Magnus's affairs, he is playing some under-game with my uncle.

He never mentions his name; but every now and then I see an expression of confident and triumphant satisfaction lighting up his impudent countenance, which conveys a meaning to my mind that he feels conscious he is somehow or in some way carrying his point in deceiving Mortimer, and is anxious to make me understand that I am a person for whom he has a very high regard.

“As for Mortimer, every year seems to draw him farther from me — I mean with respect to that which I have all along so earnestly desired, — a confidential reliance upon me, — a singleness of thought, and purpose, and intention. My whole life is spent in endeavouring to secure the wished-for certainty that I am trusted and beloved. I deserve that reliance: — but no — let what may happen, I am never told of it until some third person informs me. The advertisement in the newspapers of the sale of an estate which Mortimer parted with last year, was the first announcement to me of his intention to dispose of it: upon the smallest as well as most important family arrangements, except those purely personal, I am never consulted.—Why this is, I know not.

“ I had hoped that this reserve, which is growing almost into coldness, would have given place to some more congenial feeling after his recovery from his long and dangerous illness: for seven weeks I never quitted his bed-side, except when at intervals he got a little sleep. I watched him by day and night, and prayed for him as he slept. I hoped to prove to him how truly, how devotedly I loved him; and when, by Heaven's goodness, he recovered, all I longed for, was, that confidence which I feel I never yet have succeeded in obtaining. Do not, my dear father, think that I mean to trouble you with my grievances, at a time when you should be kept quiet: it is no new theme. All I desire in the world is to be trusted:—I am not;—I feel myself therefore degraded.

“ Under this affliction, for I call it nothing less, Providence has sent me consolation and support,—my two dear children are the constant s of my care and attention. Francis is ng fast, and like his father, who really fond of him. I know men dislike the of infants, and sometimes even affect a of them in order to avoid the ridicule of y friends, who take pleasure in laughing the best feelings of our nature. The dear almost begins to talk, and is one of the engaging babies, as Teresa says, that ever

Rosa is yet too young to give me the est idea of what she will turn out; but re to me treasures dearer than my life:
et, I think, Mortimer is not pleased that I much in my nursery. Oh! that I could discover the means of engaging his mind,— ring his sympathy! But I will not com-the day may come; and I am resolved en to murmur, except to you, my dear-ther. I will do my duty rigidly and ously, and I know, — I am sure, in time.

like in her manner, that I feel nearly able to consider her as a mere servant. She has been educated,—too well, I should say, for her present station in life; but, to be sure, as the unexpected bankruptcy and death of her father, are the causes of her being thrown upon the world, no blame can attach to those who, in her earlier and better days, afforded her the ordinary advantages of girls in her own sphere. I did not know the family was so large,—three sons and four other daughters. I feel extremely interested about her: she tells me her sisters are much better-looking than herself; of course, I did not express any opinion as to their relative merits that way, but I doubt very much whether anything as regards expression of countenance can exceed her own. You must not suppose, my dear father, that I am so dazzled with beauty, in either man or woman, as not to see the failings of its possessor; but, as I think Mitcham's good looks might have exposed her to danger and difficulty in the world, I rejoice to have had the opportunity of giving her a respectable situation and a comfortable home.

“ Francis Blocksford is here, agreeable and gay as usual : his pencil is in constant requisition in the morning, and his guitar in the evening. He is really a charming person, and so I believe Miss Rouncivall thinks ; but she is considerably his senior, and has no fortune, which I fancy will not particularly suit the St. Almes ; and, moreover, I suspect that Francis has left his heart in France. I had a long letter from his mother the other day, and not one word of coming over to England.

“ You ask me if I have heard anything lately of Mrs. Farnham. Alas ! no. I fancy the correspondence between her and Mortimer has ceased altogether : the report you have heard of her arrival in England may be true, for her name is never mentioned here. I wish she would return to her native country ; it might perhaps lead to a reconciliation between her and her brother. His disinclination from her is another instance of his ~~sensitiveness~~ upon the subject of his early life. Oh ! if I could : but teach him how much better it would be to assure himself of the efficacy of repentance, and a resolution to be good for the future :—but no !

“ My dearest father, I have written a volume ; Lord Harry’s frank, however, will hold it all ; and if my ‘ weighing machine ’ did not indicate that it is time I should conclude, I could still go on, — for with whom can I converse as I can with you ? — (and this is conversation) — in whom can I confide ? I will not ask the question, it brings me back to the one painful subject by which I am afflicted and worn down. If it were not for my darling children, I do think I should sink under it ; but as it is, Mortimer and I are the civilest couple in the world before company ; nay, he allows me to rally him, and joke about him, and looks contented, and even pleased ; and I believe I have therefore established a reputation as a wife dominant. Ah ! father, how truly do I now illustrate in my own case all the theories I used to hold about worldly comforts and worldly appearances. My mind is constituted for happiness. I am ardent and enthusiastic, I know ; and that ardour, and that enthusiasm, would secure the happiness I seek, and even think, I could confer ; but energies are damped ; the anxiety to please is mortified, and the warmth of affection is chilled when we are conscious that our feelings are not reciprocated. Still, father, — dearest, best of fathers ! — fear not for your child : she gave her heart to the man she loved, and no disappointment of her early hopes shall wean her from that love, or draw her from her duty.

“ Write to me, and tell me you have done as I desire. If I do not hear by return of post, I shall write to Teresa, to whom, dearest father, give my best of loves ; and believe me

“ Your affectionate and devoted child,

“ HELEN MORTIMER.”

No. II.

FROM CHARLES CALLEY PASH, ESQ. TO LORD RUMFORD.

" MY DEAR LORD, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 1844.

" I was extremely glad to get your letter. — I shall make a point of being there. I have been here now nine days, and a change of pasture is becoming necessary. This is to me an extremely dull place. I see no beauty in country excursions, and the people here seem to me to be all out of sorts. Mortimer himself is mortal dull, and stalks up and down the room in the evening, scowling about, and looking very like his grandfather's picture just stepped from its frame.

" His cook, upon whom he rather piques himself, is a failure, — a monotonous monotone-bank, who has not a spark of genius in his whole composition. I have taken pains with the man personally, and have really obtained for the society here a little hitherto unknown.

ty. I do not think Mortimer cares much at it : the man's name is Fisher, and he is an Englishman.

Old Lady Bembridge is here, cheating at cards, and making herself as great a fool as possible ; and her niece, whose case is growing desperate, is making beaux yeux all day long at Mr. Blocksford, who seems to be quite at his ease in the family : — not so his host, who appears to me to watch the young gentleman about, with a most sensitive anxiety. I never saw anybody so gone off as the lady of the house must be. She is amiable, and pleasing, and all that, but nothing like what you might me to expect from your description of her before her marriage : she seems very much addicted to her children, so until dinner we see but little of her.

“ Lady Mary Sanderstead is as gay as usual, and quite as full of gossip and scandal as ever. How lucky it is for the peace and comfort of society that there is no such place as a Palace of Truth in England : to hear her talk of other people, and see her talk to Lord Harry, is as amusing a spectacle as one can well find in a country-house.

“ I do not know if you recollect our seeing an attorney at Epsom races in a particularly awkward scrape with some of the ‘ legs,’ and something closely resembling a horsewhipping being the result: he is here, evidently doing a little dirty work for somebody. I certainly was a good deal surprised at his appearance at table the day before yesterday; however, I find that he is professionally occupied, and that he goes the day after to-morrow: he was condescending enough to invite me to the billiard-table, but a violent rheumatism, which I never had in the whole course of my existence, prevented my accepting the gentleman’s challenge.

“ Taken altogether, I think this is one of the very worst arranged houses I ever yet have been sent to, — for so I consider myself to have been; but it is always the case where the master has no turn for living, and is nearly as careless of the cellar as of the cuisine. In combination this sort of thing is terrible. If I stayed here another week, I should be starved without even being able to adopt the woodcock system, of living upon suction. I have no faith in Fisher, and very little confidence in the phisque.

“ You told me that I should be delighted with the beauties of a fishing-temple in a romantic glade on the banks of the Severn, and lured me into an anticipated liking of the place by describing the gaiety of the parties made to visit it. Deceiving man !—deluding friend ! After two or three dull mornings, diversified, as I have already said, by discoursing Mr. Fisher on the shape of his croquets, the colour of his cutlets, and the consistency of his Macedoine, not to speak of instructing him in the fabrique of the Sauce à-la-Pash, I made enquiries about this Elysian bower, when my gloomy host informed me that it was pulled down about two years since, and the gardens surrounding it ploughed up for the benefit of the agriculturist. I am afraid there is some history attached to its demolition, by the way in which one or two of the enfants de la mai-

you looked at each other when I asked the question.

“As to the negotiation about the property I talked to you of, it will never proceed farther: the place is altogether too small. However, I am equally obliged to you, and if things had been in better order here, I should have been very much obliged to your friend Mr. Mortimer; as it is, however, there is a great deal of pleasure to be enjoyed by my visit, entirely derivable, however, from the certainty of getting away in eight-and-forty hours from the present writing.

“I must tell you one smart thing which the little attorney sported yesterday after dinner. Lady Bembridge, who was sitting opposite to him, looking at him as she would at a toad, or as the King of the Brobdignagians may be supposed to have looked at Gulliver, anxious either to satisfy herself, or, more properly, to mortify him, asked him if his grandfather did not once live at some place, I forget where, in Devonshire, and if he were alive or dead.

My lady,' said Mr. Brassey, ' I really answer your ladyship's question accu-

I remember hearing that my grand-disappeared many years since, just about one of the county assizes, and I never made any farther enquiries upon the subject.'

My lady Bembridge, who is perfectly matter-of-fact, believed the story, which may probably be true enough. If it be, the way in which it is told, does infinite credit to Mr. Brassey's verisimilitude; and if not, reflects considerable honour upon his imaginativeness.

At half-past seven on Saturday, then, we parted till when, believe me, my dear Rumford,

“ Your faithful and sincere

“ C. PASH.”

In these two letters the reader will already be enabled to perceive the actual state of affairs, and the course of affairs gone by. The more of correspondence he sees, the better he will be enabled to ascertain the value of worldly friendships, and the probability of eventual happiness for Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer.

No. III.

FROM MISS ROUNCIVALL TO MISS GROVER.

" DEAR FANNY, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

" I long since hoped to have heard from you, but I suppose you have been very busy in preparing for your foreign excursion. I wish I could persuade my aunt into a similar expedition; but I believe so long as she can get her ecarté or whist, she thinks very little about the surrounding scenery, or cares for any change except that which she gets for her counters.

" This is a delightful place: nothing can be more lovely than the situation; and I, who really like the country in the season at which it looks greenest and prettiest, feel myself in a sort of paradise.

" We have a small party here. Lady Mary Sanderstead you know; she is here, and, of course, Lord Harry, — and a Captain Harvie. A little lawyer who is my aunt's aversion; and a monster of a man of the name of Pash; he is, I believe, what they call an 'East-India Director,' whatever that is : but where he comes from, I have no idea ; that he is going on Saturday is a fact by far more important to my comfort.

" Mrs. Mortimer is extremely agreeable and kind, but so changed from what she was, that I scarcely should have known her : it is nearly twelve months since I last saw her, and so great an alteration in so short a time I could hardly have imagined possible. I think she worries herself too much about her children : they are no little things enough, but when children are so little I feel no great interest in them.

I suppose it is necessary that all men and women should begin the world in that small way ; but to me, till it can talk and walk, a child is almost a nuisance.

" Mrs. Mortimer, however, devotes herself to her nursery, and, I think, Mr. Mortimer feels rather vexed that she does. She does not take a sufficiently active share in making up her little morning parties ; indeed, she scarcely shows herself, except at breakfast and luncheon, until dinner. You have no idea how pleasant Lady Mary can make herself in a small, quiet circle like this. She is full of fun and anecdote; and being some four or five years my senior, I gather traditional jokes from her against my contemporaries which are extremely amusing.

“Pray, tell me, dear Fanny, have you ever heard more about the ‘aimable Henri?’ I know exactly what you will say, — and that you will either laugh at my question, or be angry: but, seriously speaking, I think him most particularly agreeable, — not, my dear girl, to your prejudice, for I dare say he would not deign to cast his diamond eyes at such a being as Miss Rouncivall: nevertheless, do tell me. A little sincerity is a very charming cadeau; and all I pique myself upon, is the possession of a large stock of that commodity.

“I told you, some two years or more since, that I acted bridesmaid, by aunt’s desire, to the widow-bride of Mrs. Mortimer’s father. It was, as I mentioned, altogether a most ridiculous affair: the absurd affectation of the lady, who was the widow of some city shopkeeper; and the still more absurd, affected juvenility of the bridegroom, never have left my recollection. The poor dear bridegroom of that day is, however, dangerously ill, which, of course, adds to Mrs. Mortimer's dulness. Oh! Fanny, if the option were offered me to die, or marry Mr. Mortimer, supposing he had not married before, I think I should prefer death, and a decent funeral, to such a union.

“ Now, you will ask me, why?—he is handsome, — agreeable, — accomplished, — and although, perhaps, (because between you and me there cannot be many secrets as to age,) twenty years my—may I say our—senior, he is in society most charming and most fascinating, still there is something about him—I cannot explain it—but this is entirely entre nous—which is odious. He seems to me as if Old Nick had some serious claims upon him; and that while his bright eyes are sparkling, and a sweet smile is playing over his features, there is something beyond our ken, which holds him, if not to another world, at least to some other train of thoughts and feelings. Mark my words,—Mrs.

Mortimer is not happy. She does everything she can to make us believe she is the most fortunate and most entirely delighted wife in the world, but I am sure it is not so. Aunt Bembridge has never said anything upon the subject; but from some of her hints and inferences, I am certain she is quite of my opinion.

“Mrs. Mortimer appears to me to be as much changed in mind as in person since I first knew her. She is now so very good, that she even goes the length of repressing any joke at the expense of her absent friends, which amounts almost to the absurd: still, as I have already said, she is all kindness to her guests. There is none of that off-hand smartness, — that sort of character-sketching, in which she used to excel, and which, to say truth, made her so many enemies. One thing, I think, she has done, which is injudicious; she has brought into the house, in the capacity of her own maid, — who is to grow into a nursery governess when young Francis, and his still younger sister, Rosa, — for so are the babies named, require the office of such a servant, — one of the prettiest young women I ever saw : it seems she is the daughter of respectable parents, who have met with some reverses of fortune, and Helen has therefore become deeply interested in her fate, and is determined to patronize her. I do not think this wise : the young woman appears all diffidence and submission, but I should say—why, I shall not say—that I think her far too engaging for her situation ; and I very much doubt whether her mistress will not repent of her kindness : however, I may be wrong ; and, besides, one ought not to be uncharitable : if we were to give way to all our fancies and suspicions, we should lose half the pleasure of life, which is derived from doing good.

“ Let me beg you, my dear Fanny, to write to me : you would not, I am sure, think of leaving England without bidding me good-b’ye in a long, long letter. The Dartnells have taken a house at Exmouth for the whole summer : poor dear Mrs. Dartnell, who is really a kind-hearted woman, has done this because she thinks it will be good for Caroline’s health, and because dear good Dr. James Johnson has advised it. Caroline writes me word that she detests the scheme, and that all her anxiety was to remain in town till the end of August, but that she dare not rebel against her mother's orders; especially as George Walford will be quartered at Hounslow, and she knows that her mother would attribute her unwillingness to leave London to her anxiety for a chance of seeing him after his final banishment from the house. Mrs. Dartnell is very shortsighted, but thinks herself prodigiously wise, and honours me with her confidence and correspondence, in which latter she entreats me to exert the influence she knows I possess over Caroline to make her in love with this design of Devonshire rustication, which, of course, I have promised to do; but which, as I am sure the attempt would be useless, and, if not, would make me very unpopular with Caroline, I certainly shall not try, — for Caroline, although a dear amiable creature, has a temper and a tongue, neither of which, with all my sincere regard for her, I have any desire to rouse into action.

“ Young Mr. Walton has proposed to Louisa Barton, who, to the astonishment of ‘a numerous circle of friends,’ has refused him. She wrote me the whole history, and it really was so absurd, that I could not help reading a part of her letter to Lady Mary, who was exceedingly amused by the enumeration of the reasons which led her to the unexpected conclusion. I cannot understand it; he is agreeable, with money, — and although not an Adonis, like ‘Henri,’ still is quite good-looking enough; and she, plain, not very young, (seven years our senior,) not rich, nor anything else very fascinating, kills his hopes, and discards him. I ought to be extremely obliged to her for detailing all her reasons for so doing, — not that I at all needed the confession: however, I wrote her a letter full of approbation of what she had done; for, although I think it exceedingly foolish, and am quite sure she will regret it hereafter, there could be no necessity for my making myself disagreeable to her by finding fault with a measure which was irrevocable.

“ I have no other news for you, nor room to say anything more but that I remain, my dear Fanny, “ Yours affectionately and sincerely,

“ P. S. — I forgot to tell you that we have here Mr. Blocksford, a son of the odious Countess St. Alme by her former husband. He is exceedingly handsome, and highly accomplished: he is very young, and I should say giddy; but his singing to the accompaniment of his own guitar is very charming: he draws beautifully, and is an unequalled pattern of good-nature. It might sound vain to you, dear Fanny, to say that I think I am his favourite of the party; but it is not of my seeking. Mr. Mortimer appears to be extremely attached to him,—I suppose, for his mother’s sake.’ However, thank our stars! she is not here. Young Blocksford treats Mrs. Mortimer as if she were his sister, and his husband treats him as if he were his son. People do say strange things, but I never thought to tittle-tattle,—only he certainly is the most our elegant host, and his name is Francis: but then he is Mortimer's godson, and 'that accounts for it.' I think, if you saw him, you would say that he rather transcends the 'aimable Henri' in looks; only you know that, to me, personal appearance in a man is but a secondary consideration: Francis Blocksford, however, is very handsome. When you write, tell me if you have ever seen him. Adieu! dear Fanny, once more."

As these letters are given exactly as they turn up in the box, it may appear a by no means unhappy coincidence that the very next which comes to hand is one from this "Adonis of the woods," Mr. Blocksford himself, addressed to his most intimate friend Robert Gram, from whom he had no secrets, and to whom the reader will perceive he communicates all the outpourings of his young and love-fraught heart. It does not present at all an unacceptable pendant to the epistle of Miss Rouncivall; for, if not equal to it in worldly knowledge, it is at least its superior in sincerity.

No. IV.

FROM FRANCIS BLOCKSFORD, ESQ. TO ROBERT
GRAM, ESQ., C.C. OXFORD.

“ MY DEAR GRAM, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“ I am either the most fortunate or most miserable of created mortals. During all my former periodical visits to this place, I have been quite charmed with the urbanity of my host, who, as an old friend of my mother's, has put me quite à mon aise, and has indeed given me a more unlimited control over the establishment than I feel I have any right to; and as to his charming Helen, who really seems to me the beau idéal of a perfect wife, I never in my existence — not, to be sure, a very long one, — have seen a woman who appeared to me to blend all manner of kindness and good-humour with prudence and amiability in so delightful a manner.

“ I have now known her for three years, and, of course, in the earlier part of our acquaintance she treated me as a big boy growing manhood, and seemed rather to encourage transition from the chrysalism of what you in England 'hobbledehoyism,' by a sort of sterner feeling which I duly appreciated.

soul! nothing can be better or more helpful than she is, and you know how I appreciate her goodness and that of Elmer.

The party here is this year, at least to me, —accustomed as a boy to the gaiety of Paris, not in the least understanding in France the society of a country-house meant, much as we have no such comprehension. We have been enraptured with the réunions at Trove; but, this year, I declare it is melancholy. There is a Miss Rouncivall, a sort of preserved old beauty, about thirty, who is, I must confess, oppressively good-natured to me; she makes me draw everything upon the surface of the earth or the waters for her in the evening; she forces me to walk about with her in the gardens, to ride with her in the country, and, in short, to do everything which my friends and her aunt permit, whilst I am unfortunately devoted to what some people may call a meaner, and many, a baser pursuit.

“ My dear Gram, this dear friend of mine, Helen Mortimer, has, in the plenitude of her benevolence, taken into her establishment such a creature—come, no frowns, no moralizing,—as her maid; how long she will remain in that character I do not pretend to say: she is called Miss Mitcham. Now, just picture to yourself a creature with the most symmetrical imaginable figure, very little favoured by purchasable in-and-outishness; with feet almost as small as our beautiful friend who shall be nameless; eyes the most brilliant, yet full of all sorts of expression; a mouth only just sufficiently opening, when it smiles, to show two rows of teeth, which to compare with pearls were an absurdity, inasmuch as the best pearls are not always the whitest; and an air and manner that would dazzle a duchess. I confess I never saw such a being.

“ Hear me, Gram: this girl is well-born and well-bred; I suppose my excellent mother would cut my legs off if she thought I could be so low and grovelling in my views as to feel a real and sincere passion for a person in such a position of life; but, upon my soul! I do believe that the girl is so far above her present state in mind and accomplishments, that Helen herself feels a difficulty in preserving their relative positions.

“ This divine creature puzzles me; I can think of nothing else. I declare, if I could prevail upon her to quit a service — ay, Gram, service, for that is the word, — for which she never was designed, and is not fitted, I would risk the censure of the world, and my lady-mother into the bargain, and go the whole length of marrying her.

“ Oh, Gram, Gram! she is so beautiful! — I wish to Heaven you could but see her! It sounds, of course, quite ridiculous, and I dare say you will think me mad, and that I had no business to notice such a person; and then I know what you will say in your answer, — ‘ Give her twenty guineas, and she will be very civil and good-natured.’ No, no, Gram: I declare to you, whether I am mad, as I begin to think I am, or whether I am not, I do not care, but I love her to distraction; — I do, I do: and yet, Gram, I would not that she should suffer by me or for me — no: — but I think nothing can turn me from this love, for it is my first, — my first real love.

“ My dear friend, — my dear Gram, — I shall be one-and-twenty next week: see what a line of years are before me, if I marry this young, innocent creature, well educated! Helen says all that of her; — for, whenever I can get Helen out of her nursery, I take her to walk in the garden round the house, never letting her know my object, and accidentally, as it seems, or incidentally, as it may be, bring her to speak of Mary Mitcham. Whether she is at all aware of my admiration, — whether Mitcham, as they call her, has told her, (I am never sure of what these women do,) I don't know, but she seems to humour me in the conversation; and never do we part, after one of these tête-à-têtes, without my being the more assured, upon Helen's own showing, that this beautiful Mary Mitcham, — recollect, Gram, a gentlewoman born, — would make an excellent wife.

“ Am I romantic, Gram? — am I wild? I see nothing before me but paths strewn with flowers, — an Eden which only wants an Eve: I do think, indeed I do, that I have found her. Dear, blessed, sweet innocent! she knows nothing of the strength of my feelings. My dear Gram, I love her devotedly, — devoutly love her! Am I to blame? — can hearts be controlled? — all this is perhaps Fate. Darling — she is an angel!

“ The party here is as usual, I suppose, agreeable; — but, as I tell you, to me it is all a blank. I taste nothing, see nothing, hear nothing, — my beautiful Mary is a servant! — think of that, Gram: she who can talk, and sing, as well as any of them, and looks ten thousand times better, is excluded as a servant! I am sick at heart! All my resource is, when I am unable to see her, — and I scarcely ever can, except in the nursery, where she is supreme, — is getting into the woods and throwing myself under the budding trees, and thinking of her: — but she knows of my love for her — yes, yes! — and does not kill my hopes. Now, Gram, I trust you will not show me up to Wilson or Ward, or Hall or Martyn; — and a laugh at my expense, Gram, and it shall not hurt you dear! — but you won't, — I know you won't. You are my friend, — my true friend! You have told me stories of yourself; and, by Jove! if you betray me! — But if you could but see this creature, — this lady, for that is the proper term, — this beautiful lady! — you would at once agree with me in all I say.

“ Dear me! how sickening is all the detail of what is here called comfort and gaiety! — and, oh! that Miss Rouncivall — how she punters me! And then, poor Mary Mitchem! ten times handsomer, and twenty times cleverer, comes in sometimes with a shawl or a bonnet for Helen, while I am subserviently doing Miss Rouncivall's biddings: — and then the dancing, and the wineing, and all the rest of it; and the music, and the ecarté for Lady Bombast, who patronizes me; and then the flirtation with Lady Mary Sanderstead and Lord Harry.

wonder they are not tired of the same performance, which I recollect, night after night, ever since I first saw them. Some people say Lord Harry will marry her when old Sanderhead dies; but I should think, after a decided flirtation of twenty years, of the nature which everybody imagines theirs to have been, they may both seek variety with somebody else when the veteran drops off, unless indeed, as I hear, but cannot yet quite comprehend, that affection becomes habitual.

“ I tell you who Mary Mitcham is something like, — that beautiful girl we saw at the ball at Cheltenham, only infinitely more delicate; her eyes are so much fuller of expression. And then, my dear Gram, to think that he is doomed to the enormities of the secondable! Oh, Gram, I wish you could but see her! — and yet I would rather you should not — her figure is so exquisite. I don't like to say much to Helen about her, but — Oh, my dear Gram, I am mad! — I am, upon my honour and soul!

“ I am not quite sure that Mortimer is alto-now, more t given up all atte observed, when walks or rides, t nipped me in th

prised if the old way himself: but am in earnest. I Heaven before me
poet tells us,

‘ Love is Heave

“ My dear Gram, write upon. If I co hair!—but I cannot so lovely! — really a anything like it, — an — write to me, — adv
I care for always call her, is; she is all sweetness and good-nature, and so fond of her dear children : I suppose that is all right : and I hear the women call them fine children, and pretty children ; but, as far as I am concerned, I am like the man in the book, — I forget what book, — who declared he never could see any difference in babies, they were invariably the same, all so soft, and so red, and so very like their fathers. Mary Mitcham, by the way, sings sweetly ; — I heard her the day before yesterday ; — oh ! a thousand times better than Miss Rouncivall, who is cried up as a great cantatrice. I have made half-a-dozen sketches of Mary, but not one of them does her justice : Lawrence could not have done her justice. I say again, I wish you could see her, — and yet I would rather you should not ; I should like nobody to see her but myself.

“ Why, my dear Gram, — why would there be anything wrong or degrading in my marrying the only being upon earth who could make me happy ? She is of a most respectable family : where there is respectability, misfortune enhances the interest which beauty and innocence excite. Advise me, — tell me what you think ; only do not kill the hopes I entertain. Bid me follow the dictates of my heart, and make this amiable creature my wife. A whole life will be well spent in endeavouring to secure her happiness. Oh, to madness do I love her ! Write, my dear friend, write, and say you sympathize with me. What in this world could compensate for the loss of dear, dear Mary ! I shall wait your answer with the deepest anxiety. Adieu ! dear friend ; only let me implore you to write.

“ Yours always truly,

“ FRANCIS BLOCKSFORD.”

To this most ardent, earnest appeal from the young lover to his valued friend, succeeds an epistle from Mr. Swing, Lord Harry's man, to Mrs. Swing, his loving wife.

No. V.FROM MR. SWING TO MRS. SWING.*NANCY, and hoped to have got away from this e, but my lord is still so deucedly o Lady Mary, that there is no part-

To be sure, in an honourable, right-itforward matter of marriage, that ng is quite laudable and the like;
ure, Nancy, I never by no accident repented of the day when we was because I am never so happy as mstances permits us to be together;
s, when there isn't what I call right nd the Church service to bind two ne another, I do not think it alto-t to see what, in course you know do, is going on. But I never says ne way or the other; I'm as close d as to my lord, why, if I do some-little out of him, I take special care ll not be cheated by anybody else.

“ He knows that, and he knows how careful I am of his reputation. Why, when that Mr. Wattle which writes the statistical — I don't mean statistical, — satirical novels, offered me three guineas to tell him some anecdotes about my lord, and where he went ofttest to dine, and when he slept at home, and when he went to the country, I refused the money point-blank slap-dash; not only because I wouldn't betray my lord, but, but because I despised the meanness of the cretur', to offer me such a disparaging sum. In course, I told my lord what I had done, and he instantly give me a ten-pound note, thus making out the old adder, that ‘Honesty is the best policy;’ and so, my dear Nancy, you may depend upon it, it is, whenever you can get most by it.

“ It is quite wonderful to see how curious little folks are about great ones. There is a lawyer here amongst the company, — a Mr. Brasse; in course, he is only down for some job which he is to be paid for, but they let him sit at table, and all that, nevertheless, he is uncommon low in the trade; and as I was a-standing giving some directions about our carriage h was in the court-yard, up he comes, and is: 'I suppose Lord Harry travels a good

' I give him a look!—(uncommon civil,) id nothing that little Six-and-eight-pence
I lay hold of—'Yes, sir,' says I.

'Did you come down straight from Town?'
little Nickey.

'Don't recollect, sir,' says I, and walked off. Up I goes to my lord, and I says, I, 'My lord, in case that small gentleman the sky-blue under-waistcoat, that sits at the bottom of the table at dinner, ld complain of my being impudent, I'll mention the fact.' So I ups and tells him; he laughed like anything, and said I was right.

Why, bless your soul! Nancy, at that , Chapel House,—I don't think much of place itself,—while we were a-changing as, the head waiter comes up to me, and : 'How well your master is looking!'

'Yes,' says I, 'pretty well; and how are
'

“ ‘ I’m pretty well,’ says the snob. ‘ But,’ says he, ‘ what’s your master’s name? I have known him a long time up and down the road.’

“ So I wasn’t to be had in that way. What d’ye think I said in reply? ‘ What’s his name?’ said I. ‘ Why, I have only lived with him eight years, and I never took the liberty yet of asking him.’ I wish you had seen Snob’s face. No, no: there’s nothing like caution; and I am sorry to see other people are not so particular as I am.

“ Mr. Wilkins, Mr. Mortimer’s right hand—not that I mean to say a word in disparagement of him, for he stands treat like a Trojan,—and he and Mr. Tapley, the upper butler, are really liberal fellows in regard of table and all those arrangements; but he leaks,—lets out things he ought to keep in. I don’t believe he is treacherous, but his head isn’t so strong as it ought to be; and although, in course, we confine ourselves to claret, after the port foundation is laid, I have heard him say strange things as to the unpleasant way in which Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer live. As for Miss Mitch-am, Mrs. Mortimer's own maid; she looks as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth: but my notion is, that she and Wilkins are what you call hand in glove; and that she tells him all she can find out about her mistress, and that he tells all he hears from her to his master. Now, that would be all very well if he gets proper remuneration; but he should recollect that all that is quite in the enter-nous line, as they call it, and that he ought not to speak about such things to other people.

“Wilkins tells me,—only, in course, this goes no further, — that Mrs. Mortimer is over head and ears in love with a Mr. Blocksford, who is always staying here,—a nice, handsome-looking fellow, and as good-natured a chap as ever I saw, — and that Mortimer has told Wilkins to keep an eye upon him; which, if he has done, in course, Wilkins ought to keep to himself. And what makes Wilkins think there is a good deal of truth in this is, that Mr. Blocksford is always a-dangling after Mitcham, which is Mrs. Mortimer's maid, and always making some excuse to go and see the children, two little babbies; which, you know, is not by any means likely, because at his time of life, babbies is not no manner of attraction. So I was rogueing Mitcham herself about the young dandy's civilities, and that he was in love with her; but the moment I spoke about it, out of the room he went, and never came down no more that night: and what with that, and her being constantly with Mrs. Mortimer, Wilkins thinks that something rather wrong is hatching. But, as I said to myself, if Mr. Mortimer really set his man to watch his wife, it was an action which I would scorn, for I think it more calculated to turn her wrong than keep her right; and, at all events, Wilkins ought not to tell tales out of school.

"We none of us like Miss Mitcham,—we call her 'my lady;' and although Miss Nettleship, which is Lady Bembridge's young lady, is as nice and agreeable a young person as ever trod shoe-leather, Miss Mitcham will not associate with her, nor with Lady Mary's maid, at which I do not so much wonder. But no: Miss Mitcham likes to read books; and she sings.

songs, and loves to watch the babbies while they are asleep, and the mamma is away, which to me looks very much like being very fond of their papa; because, to a young woman at her time of life, I am quite sure our society, with conversation and cards, and a remarkable nice supper, with all the etceteras, must be more agreeable than seeing two little things like them snoozling in a cot, unless there was something in it.

“ Now, Nancy, never you betray one word of what I am going to say :—my belief is, that there is more going on in this house than many people may think — (Wilkins never dropped the smallest hint of this,—that I must say) — but what I have taken into my head is, that Mr. Mortimer himself is taken with the pretty face of this Miss Mitcham, and so wishes, if he can, to catch out young Blocksford in something which may make a regular blow-up. Besides, it is quite surprising to see how fond everybody in this establishment is of babbies: never an evening comes but up goes Mr. Mortimer the moment wine is over,—and he drinks scarcely any — and it isn't good, ~~themselves~~, except some that Wilkins gets from Tapley for our table — however, up stairs he goes to look at the babbies, and then there is Miss Mitcham watching them. To be sure, there is Mith Horton, which is the nurse, and Sarah the nursery-maid; but still — in course I say something, — and then Mr. Mortimer kisses the babbies, and Miss Mitcham holds the candles; and then he comes down again, and goes into the drawing-room; and then Mrs. Mortimer, she goes up and kisses the babbies; and then Mr. Blocksford strolls into the billiard-room and knocks the balls about, and then out he goes up the stairs which lead to his room, and then, if he sees the door ajar, and Mrs. Mortimer is in the nursery, in he goes to look at the babbies. Something will come of it — that you may depend upon.

“We are tolerably comfortable. When I first came down we had muttons for our bedrooms, but I soon set that to rights, and neither Miss Nettleship nor Miss Brown, Lady Mary's young lady, now ever ~~shin~~ ~~hand~~ coming to dinner without having their hair properly dressed, and no caps. We have quadrilles in the evening, and do very well; only Miss Mitcham retires, and hopes that the fiddles won't wake the babbies: they are not within fifty yards of them,—but it is what she calls fine and affectionate. She is playing her game double deep, and, as Miss Nettleship says, if she can but find her out, woe betide her.

“ I hope you got the trout safe. It is very early, and if I hadn't got them netted, you wouldn't have had them. Mr. Mortimer is very particular about his trout-streams; but we, who are not so rich, cannot wait till the fly is up, so we net them: also I have sent you some very fine lampreys, ready dressed. I don't think you would like them to eat, inasmuch as they taste very like pitch, therefore send them to Mr. Buffley, the glover, in return you know for what. The little pots of lamperns are a delightful relish, so keep them. I am on exceedingly good terms with our cook here, who is a remarkably nice fellow of the name of Fisher, and will do anything for me. In fact, the lampreys I send were down in the carte for dinner to-day, but the moment I just insinuated my wish, out they went, and salmon took their place, which grows in the river at the bottom of the garden; lampreys, ditto; but it's all in the dressing. Never mind—let the glover have them.

“And so now, dearest Nancy, no more at present. I hope to be back in a week or ten days at farthest: I shall be exceedingly glad to get home. Remember me kindly to Bill and the rest: I hope they treat you well. And believe me yours most truly,

— “JOHN SWINKE.”

Every step we take towards the development of affairs appears to entangle them the more; and so far from effecting the much-desired purpose of clearing away the difficulties with which the family of Mortimer seem to be surrounded and threatened, a combination of evils, misunderstandings, misconstructions, and misapprehensions arise around us.

We have yet one or two letters to open from more important personages of the drama, which may tend to enlighten us as to the real facts of the case, at which the subordinates can only, by circumstances, be permitted to guess. We must first, however, allow our friend, Lady Bembridge, to communicate, after her own fashion, some of her sentiments and opinions to the Dowager Duchess of Gosport, one of her oldest friends and greatest allies, and who was a sort of sister chaperon to Helen in other days. The reader, already familiar with her ladyship's style of conversation, must expect nothing more than hypothesis in her epistle to the Duchess.

No. V.

LETTER FROM THE COUNTESS OF BEMBRIDGE TO THE DUCHESS DOWAGER OF GOSPORT.

“MY DEAR DUCHESS, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“Whenever a person is sensible of friendly attentions and an earnest desire on the part of others to do them a kindness, it is impossible to quit the scene of their hospitality and good nature without regret; and certainly, if ever anybody were justified in feeling grateful for courtesy and affection exhibited towards them in this house, I am that individual. Marquis

“ When one sees a couple, who seem devoted to each other, domesticated in a beautiful retreat, in the enjoyment of every earthly comfort and luxury, it naturally occurs to the observer of human nature to enquire whether the happiness with which they are apparently blest is, in point of fact, genuine and entire. If an intimate acquaintance with the persons themselves, and a careful consideration of all the circumstances connected with their marriage, should lead one to entertain a doubt upon the subject, we grow naturally apprehensive that some day or other the calm in which they appear to exist, will break into a storm, the consequences of which may be the wreck of all their hopes and expectations. Robert ”

“ I would not, my dear Duchess, have you infer from anything I have said upon this point that I intend to apply my remarks to any par-particular case, for I have always observed, that if a person, however intimately connected with a family, venture to meddle in its affairs, or even offer suggestions, tending, as might be supposed, to secure its comfort and happiness, that person becomes involved in innumerable difficulties, and generally incurs the anger and indignation of both parties: all I mean to say is, that when once the idea of a possibility of such a state of circumstances has taken possession of the mind, it is extremely difficult to mingle in the domestic life of such a pair without an anxiety incompatible altogether with a perfect enjoyment of their society.

“Should it occur that the Winsburys are able to receive Harriet and myself next week, it seems probable that we shall leave this, on a visit to them; but where a family is extremely large, and its connexions exceedingly numerous, it is scarcely possible to be sure of a reception exactly at the time we are prepared to avail ourselves of a general invitation. At all events, if circumstances, quite unexpected at present, should not intervene, the visit which

Harriet and I have so long anticipated, with pleasure will be made out, and we shall present ourselves at Hartbury accordingly.

" Believe me, my dear Duchess,

" Yours most sincerely,

" E. BURTON."

" Were Harriet at hand, she would, I am sure, desire me to add her best regards and affectionate remembrance."

The next female correspondent whose turn comes to be exhibited, is Lady Mary Sanderstead, from whom we have more than one letter.

No. VI.

FROM LADY MARY SANDERSTEAD TO LADY ALICE BURTON.

Sedgrove Hall,

" MY DEAR SISTER ALICE;

April 2, 1841.

" Your letter afforded me a vast amount of amusement. Your description of your party at Rollesford is admirable; and I can quite imagine your enjoyment of all that has been going on ; not but that we have some things to amuse us even here.

“ Poor dear Mrs. Mortimer, who evidently remains just as fond of her precious husband as ever, is absolutely in heroics if the slightest hint is thrown out as to his agreeable levities. She flatters herself that she has quite reformed him, and seems resolved not to have her eyes opened : — ainsi soit il, it is no affair of mine ; and as I have enough of my own to look after, I give her up. She is exceedingly fond of her children, — not more so, probably, than I should have been of mine, if I had been blest, as they call it, with any ; but I must say, to indifferent persons, it is rather tiresome : of course, if she chooses to hide herself in her nursery, that can be nothing to anybody else, if she would only take a little more pains to make things agreeable for her friends. I believe, after all, that the way she leaves us, entirely to ourselves, is best calculated for our amusement. We do just as we like, — order the horses and carriages when we please, without the slightest demur or interruption, — for Mortimer is generally eclipsed all the morning, — shut up with a lawyer, — or else riding, or walking, or fishing with young Blockford, to whom he appears to pay particular attention.

“ I cannot quite make this out. I believe he is as jealous of him as ever middle-aged man was of young one; whether with reason or not, I do not pretend to say. The youth is in love — of that I am certain, and so is Mortimer; and my belief is, that he makes him the companion of his walks and rides, not so much, as Lord Harry thinks, in order to worm out his secret, as to keep him away from the house during the mornings. I remember Sandstead's condition when we married was, that I was to change my dandy every week, and receive no morning visitors. Mortimer appears to be of poor dear Sandy's opinion touching this last point: — we shall see. Mr. Blockford seems solicitously attentive to Helen, and his manner this year is very much altered generally: in fact, he is growing more into the world and its ways; and, considering who his mother is, the probabilities are, he will make rapid progress that way.

“ I have heard nothing about her, or her annual visit : indeed, Mortimer rarely mentions her name, and looks odd when anybody else speaks of her. I think there is some understanding, arising probably out of some little misunderstanding between the ‘ happy ’ pair, that the amiable Countess is not to be a guest at Sadgrove ; whence arises the awkwardness of feeling which is manifested when the subject is touched upon.

“ Colonel Magnus, the odious, is to be here in a few days, at least so Mrs. Mortimer says. How she can speak of that man with patience, I cannot understand ! I really believe she is too good, too confiding, and too unsophisticated for this world. Certain am I that she has not a bitterer enemy than that said Colonel. The way in which I have heard him speak of her in general society, the contemptuous tone which he assumes whenever she happens to be talked of, and the lamentation in which he indulges at the extraordinary sacrifice his friend Mortimer made in marrying her, provoke even me, who have no particular friendship for her, — but I hate deceit ; and whatever her failings may be,—however disagreeable her manner or equivocal her temper may have been, I cannot endure with patience hearing a person, constantly associated with a woman under the roof of her husband at that husband's invitation, speak of her in terms of such disrespect and disparagement as those which he uses when speaking of her. Whenever I find a man talking in such a manner, I suspect that his vanity has been somehow mortally offended; but in the case of Colonel Magnus, as all his love and admiration are bestowed upon himself, there is not, I think, the slightest probability of his having suffered a repulse from anybody in the world. His coming, however, is the signal for my going; and although the cave of Trophonius itself is Almacks', compared with Glumston, I shall fly to its lengthened avenues, its dingy tapestry, and its shining floors, with delight, as a refuge from an association with Colonel Magnus. He has endeavoured to 'make friends,' as they say, with poor dear Sanderstead, but he did not suit Sandy; and if he had suited him, he would not have suited me. People who have malicious minds and evil tongues should take care before whom they speak. Colonel Magnus, I know, has said things of me, which, if I were silly enough to tell Sanderstead, would lead to extremities — horrible things! — But I should be both foolish and wicked to put my husband's life in peril by telling him all I do know.

“ You must let me hear before I leave this. I propose staying only three or four days at Glumston, and then proceed to finish the season. Those Fogburys are certainly the most melancholy race alive; but as connexions of poor dear Sandy's, I must go some time or other; and the opportunity a visit now affords me of escaping my persecutor, — and the man watches one like a lynx, — is the best I can avail myself of.

“ You ask me if I like Captain Harvie: — decidedly yes! — he is admirably good-natured, and a sincere friend of Harry's. By the way, somebody was kind enough to send me a newspaper, in which there was a paragraph about

Harry and me. Harry thought at one time of prosecuting the people, but by my advice he dropped all idea of it:—there is something very dreadful in having one's name canvassed in a court of law. He then talked of horsewhipping the editor, if he did not give up the authors; but this would have been as bad, — worse indeed, for it might have ended more seriously for Harry, — so we agreed to burn the papers and think no more about it. If our kind friend had not sent it, we should never have known of it; as it is, few people read the thing, and fewer care about it;—and, in fact, ‘the least said is soonest mended.’

“Old Lady Bembridge remains, with the most charming and fascinating niece of hers, Miss Rouncivall: as a pair,—each in her way,—they are incomparable with anything I ever met with. The old lady is so extremely expert at écarté, that she can get nobody now to play with her here but Mortimer, who seems to feel it a duty to permit himself to be made a victim. Miss is smitten with young Blackford, but to her passion, alas! there is no

'no return.' What on earth the master of the house sees in these people, who are, in fact, no friends of his, I cannot imagine: I believe he fancies his wife likes them, the which I take to be an error. They are, however, on the move; so that another ten days will leave these sylvan scenes deserted, unless their master and mistress choose to remain in their Paradise, as Miss Rouncivall calls it, where, if they propose to play Adam and Eve for the rest of the season, Colonel Magnus, who is to stay with them, is admirably qualified to make the third of the party.

"I have told you before of the little attorney who, two or three years since, came down for two days' business, over-ate and over-drunk himself on the first, and was laid up with a five-weeks' fit of the gout: he is here again, only for two or three days: it is wonderful to see how careful Mr. Mortimer is of his health. He is the most ridiculous person imaginable, and not by any means safe. Only imagine, the night before last, Mortimer saved himself from old Bembridge, and set Mr. Brassey to play écarté with her. The delight of this delegation was great to the little man, but most oppressive to Bem; however, so as she wins, she cares little from whom, and they started Mortimer advising. At about the third deal, after Mr. Brassey had cut the cards, the old lady went fidgiting about the counter, and challenged her antagonist's score, which, as she knew, was perfectly correct. Having performed these essential manœuvres, she took up the pack, and was on the point of beginning to deal, when the little man, with an energy and animation not to be described, said,—

“ ‘ Stop, my lady, if you please: your ladyship has put the wrong parcel at top. I cut to the right—eh !’

“ Bem looked vexed and angry, but it was far beneath her character and station to do what she knew to be true, and she therefore merely said, in the most dignified manner which she could assume,—

“ ‘ Did I ? — I beg your pardon, sir Earl —’
 “ and put the pack down upon the table, to be re-cut at the attorney's discretion. He did not them again, and, if the matter had rested there, all might have been well ; but in order to convince Mortimer of the justice of his suspicions and the prudence of his play, when he had taken off the top packet, and took up the under one to place on the top of that, he turned it up before he deposited it, and, with a sort of wink that I never shall forget, exhibited to Mortimer a king at the bottom of it ! The look of exultation which enlightened his countenance at the verification of his anticipation, was accompanied with a loud ‘Umph !’ and the application of his fore-finger to the side of his nose. Bem did not, or would not, see this ; but poor dear Harriet certainly did. What a man to have in decent society !

“ Well now, dear Alice, mind and write me a nice budget of Rillesford intelligence. I had a letter about ten days ago from poor dear Sanderstead : he was then at Malta, but expected to return to Gibraltar in a week or two. He has sent me some extremely pretty chains, one of which I intend for you, and a profusion of oranges. He writes most affectionately ;

indeed, he is a dear good creature, and I sometimes wish I had gone with him; but he overruled my inclinations, and, to be sure, it would have been rather 'roughing it,' as he calls it."

"I have told Mrs. Mortimer that I have sent her kindest regards to you, so — and I have. Harry really begs to be remembered; and in a perfect reliance upon hearing from you 'forthwith,' I remain, dear Alice,

"Your affectionate sister,

"M. S."

No. VII.

FROM THE SAME TO MRS. FOGBURY, GLUMSTON HALL, LEICESTERSHIRE.

Sadgrove Hall,

"MY DEAREST MRS. FOGBURY, April 3, 1841.

"I have been for some time longing to avail myself of your kind invitation to dear Glumston. I never shall forget the many happy hours I have passed under its hospitable roof with my dear husband. You will be delighted to know that I have heard from him at Malta: his letter breathes nothing but kind.

ness and affection, and I deeply lament not having gone with him. He has sent me some beautiful presents, which I will show you when we meet.

“ I write now to say that I shall be delighted to go to you next week : I assure you, I look forward with the greatest pleasure to a visit to your charming family. I trust that dear Amelia, and my favourite of all, Elizabeth, are well. George and Frederick are, I suppose, from home ; however, I must take as many of you as I can find, — therefore have the kindness to let me know what day in next week I may, with least inconvenience to you, join your delightful family circle. My stay can be but short, I regret to say, as I must be in town to present a young cousin at the first drawing-room after Easter.

“ As I shall have the pleasure of seeing you so soon, I need say no more at this moment but that I remain, dear Mrs. Fogbury, “ Yours most truly and sincerely,

“ MARY SANDERSTEAD.”

“ Best loves of all kinds to your dear engaging girls, and kind regards to Mr. Fogbury.

“ I forgot to say that Lord Harry Martin-gale, a great friend of dear Sanderstead, will be over at Melton next week : he is going there to look at a house which he thinks of hiring for the next season. I know, as a connexion of my husband, and being in your neighbourhood, he would be delighted to pay his respects to you and Mr. Fogbury ; and if you should be disposed to receive him any day during my stay with you, I shall have great pleasure in making you acquainted. He is a most excellent, amiable person, and if he takes the house he thinks of, will be a great acquisition to your neighbourhood.”

The next which turns up is from a person in an humbler walk of life, but who seems destined to perform no unimportant part in the play which is acting at Sadgrove.

No. VIII.

FROM MISS MARY MITCHAM TO MISS CAROLINE WILLIAMS.

“MY DEAR CAROLINE, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“When I promised to write to you regularly after I came here, I was not quite aware of the many duties I should be required to perform, and fancied that after Mrs. Mortimer was dressed for dinner, I should at least have the evenings to myself. This is not, however, the case, for Mrs. Mortimer, whose temper does not suit everybody, has, I believe, taken a great fancy to me, and makes me attend to the two children, in return for which she promises, that when they are sufficiently grown up to require a nursery governess, I shall have the situation: they are very nice children, the eldest—a boy—in particular. There is a regular nurse and nursery maid, but Mrs. Mortimer seems never satisfied unless I am there too.

“I do not regret this, as it gives me an excuse for keeping away from the housekeeper's

room, where I hear and see many things I do not like; and as Mrs. Mortimer gives me a great deal of needle-work to do, I tell them I have no time to pass in conversation and cards, in both of which they indulge in a way and at a rate which would quite astonish you. Mr. Wilkins, who is Mr. Mortimer's favourite, seems to manage everything exactly as he likes; and yet, with all this power in the house, there is not a word too bad for him to use when talking of his master, of whom he tells such stories as I am sure he ought to be ashamed to repeat.

"Mr. Mortimer is extremely kind and civil to me, and therefore it is very unpleasant for me to hear all this going on. He is very fond of his children, and comes up and sees them regularly every evening. He speaks to me just as if I were here as his equal, and so does Mrs. Mortimer; but then she sometimes scolds about nothing, and scolds without any reason. Mr. Mortimer, the other evening, bade me sit down and tell him about my family, and said that if he could be of any service in getting

William into some public office, he would do all he could ; and bade me not think of leaving, as his man Wilkins had told him I had talked of, which is true, but not on any account of what is happening here, but because of a letter I received from John Singleton, and which has kept me in a state of agitation and uncertainty for some days : however, having made up my mind, I am easier, and shall remain where I am, which, I think, is for the best. If you see John, do not take any notice that I have said anything about him, or his writing to me, as it might vex him, and if mother came to know anything about it she would be very angry, and I would not vex either her or poor John for the world : he is a kind and affectionate young man, but when I last saw him I could not help feeling that it was for the last time.

“ Mr. Mortimer was kind enough to say, that if mother would like to come here to see me, she would be quite welcome, and to stay as long as she pleased ; but I told him she would not be able to leave the younger children; when he said, ' Well, then, why should not they all come?' which was very good of him. However, I shall not tell mother all this, for even if she could come, I should not like her, who has been used to such different ways of life, to see exactly what is going on here, which might lead her to take me away; and now that I have determined upon remaining, I should be vexed and sorry to go.

" But, Caroline, you have not heard my secret yet, — for I have one, and one which no human being but yourself will ever know. There is a French countess, a great friend of Mr. Mortimer, whom I have never seen, but of whom Mr. Wilkins, and even Mrs. Stock the housekeeper, speak very strangely, and say that when she is here she is more mistress of the house than Mrs. Mortimer; and add that she has more right to be, if all was known that is true, — with none of which I meddle or make: but she has a son by a former husband, Mr. Francis Blocksford. Oh! Caroline dear, I tremble all over when I write his name! For Heaven's sake! Caroline, never mention it, — never let my poor dear mother hear it :— he is the handsomest, cleverest, kindest, best of human beings ! Mr. Mortimer is very fond of him, and is constantly with him ; but the moment he can get away, up he goes to the nursery to enquire after the children. If I am there, he will stay playing with them till Mrs. Mortimer or somebody else comes ; and as his room is on the same staircase with the nursery, he always contrives some excuse to see me.

“ Caroline dear, I know it is wrong that I should encourage hopes of a fate so far beyond my deserts, and so much above my rank in the world, but he has told me that he loves me better than his life ; and when I have bid him not talk so, he has declared, upon his honour and truth, that if I would but consent, he would marry me the day after he is of age, which is in less than a week from this time. What am I to say or do, Caroline ? It is hard to struggle against the affection I feel for one so good, and so honourable, and so charming : but if I listen to him, and say ‘ yes ’ to his proposals, what would those who have been so kind to me say? What would Mr. Mortimer, who couldn't be fonder of him if he was his own son, say? — or what would Mrs. Mortimer, who puts perfect confidence in my steadiness and propriety, think? Might I not even involve him in endless quarrels with his mother, whose temper is reported to be most violent? He says he is prepared to meet all that, that he has sufficient fortune of his own to justify his making his own choice, and that he never will rest till I have agreed to it.

“What he says, dear Caroline, about it, is, after all, not so unreasonable: it is not as if he were going to marry a person raised from a low origin to a highly respectable situation. The situation I now fill I have fallen to, through inevitable misfortune; that makes a great difference. I once told him that I would consult mother upon it, but he would not hear of it; he apprehended that she would feel it her duty to make the matter known, and that then we should be separated eternally; so I shall say nothing at home. The other day he lent me Pamela, a book I had never seen before, in which our history is very nearly told, and 'Virtue is rewarded' in the end; but novels and real life are not much alike; and yet I feel that all my hopes of happiness depend upon the result of our affection. The other day I was singing to the children, and when I turned round, there was he, standing listening. He seemed quite delighted to find that I was in some degree accomplished; and ever since he has left the door of his sitting-room open, and plays so sweetly on the guitar, accompanying such beautiful songs, all on purpose to please me, — because, of course, I cannot hear him in the evenings below.

“ One day Mr. Mortimer proposed that I should let the company hear me sing; but I pleaded so strongly against it, and explained to him how painful it would be to me, who once belonged to at least respectable society, to be let in to the drawing-room on sufferance to exhibit, that a compromise was made by Mrs. Mortimer; and Lady Mary Sanderstead and Miss Rouncivall came up to the nursery, and I sang to them: and that day Francis, —

I have written it again, — Francis came up too, and made me sing a duet with him. I did not much like Lady Mary's manner: she seemed to take no manner of notice of me; but she is a fine singer herself, and, I suppose, despised my 'humble efforts.'

"You will see by all this, Caroline dear, the way in which I am treated; give me, then, your advice as to my conduct with regard to the one great step in my life. Ought I at once to tell Mrs. Mortimer all the circumstances of the case, and leave the place, and every hope of future peace of mind? or can I, without violating the confidence reposed in me, and repaying kindness with ingratitude, secure happiness to myself and confer it on another, while, without one interested feeling in the world, I may restore my beloved mother and her dear children to their place in the world, (for this will, by his own promise, be the consequence of our marriage,) and ensure me the unfading love of one who has made himself fatally dear to me? The trial is a severe one; it is one in which I cannot be my own judge:

to you, dear Caroline, I submit myself, and by your decision will I be guided. Take time to consider and weigh the circumstances; do not be carried away by a kind anxiety for my welfare; rather consider whether that welfare is compatible with honour and justice. I own, my dear Caroline, that I earnestly hope you may decide favourably; but fear not — do what is right. Tell me how to act; and in a firm reliance on the qualities of your head and heart, I will act up to your decision without one sigh or one murmur. I shall make some reasonable excuse for quitting this, which I shall do, if I can, without inconveniencing Mrs. Mortimer, the moment I receive your unfavourable decree: if you determine for me otherwise, you shall hear further of what I intend to do.

“ Yours always most truly,

“ MARY MITCHAM.”

No. IX.

FROM THE SAME TO MR. JOHN SINGLETON.

“ MY DEAR JOHN, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“ I was surprised, and sadly vexed, at receiving your letter of the 1st; surprised, because I did not expect any letters to be addressed to me here, and, least of all, one from you so long after my leaving home; and vexed, because it cannot fail to give pain to those who are obliged to inflict it upon others.

“ You most truly say that I was pleased and delighted in your society, and our constant association for a year or two, made me feel that you were one of our family; but, my dear John, recollect how differently we are now circumstanced: I have sunk from the place which I then held, humble as it was, in life, and you are grown, like myself, two or three years older. Indeed, dear John, although I always looked upon you as one of ourselves, my feelings towards you were those of a sister towards a brother; and never, until I received your letter of the day before yesterday, did I fancy that I had excited any other sentiment in your heart.

“ Dear John, forgive me ; but I am sure, as in the end candour is best, so is it in the beginning, and therefore do not hate me when I tell you, fairly and honestly, that you have entirely mistaken the character of my affection for you, — for affection it was and is. It is true that I accepted a lock of your hair, and gave you one of mine ; it is true that I always preferred dancing with you to dancing with anybody else, and it is true that I always loved to sing the songs you liked ; but, dear John, this meant nothing more than that, being cousins, we were kind and affectionate cousins, and that I never intended to infer that I was actuated by any feeling beyond that of kind and affectionate relationship.

“ Besides, dear John, I say again, consider the difference of my position now from that in which you were accustomed to see and know me : I am now neither more nor less than a servant. What would dear Mrs. Singleton say if you were to bring home a wife from a moral situation? — It would break her heart, John; and as I know your dutiful and affectionate feelings as a son, I am quite sure you would not hazard her happiness in such a matter, even if I were to admit that which I deny, any previous knowledge of the character of your affection for me.

“ No, dear John, let me remain your fond cousin; fancy me your sister, having none of your own, and rely upon me for returning all your regard and love (if you please) in that character — anything more is out of the question; and as for the violence of your expressions towards the end of your letter, let me entreat you to calm the feelings which have given rise to them. Indeed, John, even if I were devoted to you, I am not worthy of your kindness. You have just entered upon a business of high respectability, and God grant, my dear John, that it may answer your most sanguine expectations! Look round you, and endeavour to secure in marriage some worthy and amiable woman, who may possess the means of increasing your store and advancing your interests; not unless you love her; but do, for my sake, make yourself happy with a wife who deserves you.

“ As for myself, it is impossible to say what my fate may be. All I entreat and implore of you is, to think nothing of anything that may have passed in the way of joke between us; and lest you should imagine that I am trifling with you, dear John, I enclose in the ‘ frank ’ in which I send this, the only two letters I have of yours, and that very lock of hair of which I spoke: burn mine, dear John; it is not worth returning.

“ This gives me great pain, for, as children, we were happy together, and grew up happy together; and I could have gone on, happy in the knowledge of your esteem and regard, but you have opened my eyes by your last letter, and forced me to speak the truth: — and yet forgive me — try — but I know that is difficult — to separate the love which we may feel for each other, and which I do feel for you, from that which you wish to inspire. Be my dearest, best friend, dear John: love me, I again entreat you, as a sister; but forget that you ever wrote the letter which I now return to you.

“Upon second thoughts, I will still keep the lock of your hair until you tell me that you are satisfied with my proposal. If I consider it as a brother's, I may still retain it; and then, when I look at it and think of other days, I shall say to myself, John is reasonable, and sees the justice of what I have written, and I have in him a brother who loves me. Write, therefore, once more to me, and tell me that you forgive me, and will do as I bid you.

“Before I conclude, let me beg you, dear John, not to let my mother know that you have written to me. I do not think it likely you would do so; but I should be very unhappy if she knew anything about it, and therefore I think it best to say so.

“Assure yourself that I am very happy and comfortable here. Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer are extremely kind to me, and so is everybody in the house. My health is much improved by living in this excellent air; and I want nothing to make me happy but to hear that you take what I have written in good part, and that you believe me to be, as I really am, dear John,

“ Your affectionate playfellow of other days, and, — if you please, — your loving sister at present,

“ MARY MITCHAM.”

It will be seen by Miss Mitcham's letters, that although no very great scholar, she had been sufficiently well educated to fill not only the situation which she actually held, but even that which she was, at the period when these letters were written, not very far from attaining.

It would be invidious, and probably beyond the province of a mere opener of letters, to make any remark upon this correspondence, or excite a desire in the mind of the reader to institute an enquiry as to the causes which produced Miss Mitcham's missive to Mr. John Singleton, or as to the ultimate retention of the lock of his hair, upon the Platonic system, until she should hear whether he were inclined to subscribe to her doctrines upon that particular point. As it has been agreed that all the parties to this exploded correspondence should tell their own stories, it may be fairest and best to say nothing, but turn to the next of the collection, which turns out to be—

No. X.

FROM LORD HARRY MARTINGALE TO MR. HAWES, MELTON.

“ MR. HAWES, Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“ I shall be at Melton on the 9th: get me some comfortable rooms. I shall bring no horses over, and only one servant. I wish, if there is any house to let either in or near the town, you would get the particulars, and let me find them upon my arrival. I do not want anything of the sort for myself, but I should like to hear, on account of a friend of mine.

“ H. MARTINGALE.”

No. XI.

MR. BRIMMER BRASSEY, "GENT. — ONE," &c. TO MR. DRIVER.

"DEAR D. Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

"We have so much to do in the way of pleasure here, slap-bang, and all that, that I really have no time for writing, although Squire Flat is uncommon sharp, as he thinks, in business, and keeps poring over some ridiculous point for hours, after having given up all I want in five minutes: he is quite one of your camel-swallowers. However, all goes right: his confidence in M. is wonderful, and it is, of course, my game to keep that up.

"I think I shall get him to sign the mortgages to-morrow. I want to get the thing done before M. comes, and he is expected in a day or two. I have put it all in a right train; and the chances are ten to one, if he come himself, it will all be blown up.

"It would make you open your eyes to see the things that are going on here. Mortimer himself is in love with his wife's maid — dead — over head and ears : she is really an uncommon nice creature, but not fit to be a maid in such a house as this. Only think what a silly person the lady is to have such a girl in the family, especially knowing what she must know of her husband. Luckily Miss M. does not seem to 'come to corn,' as we say at the 'Slap-bang,' with him : yet she is deucedly good-natured, and, I think, fancies me to be about the best of the bunch here.

" I must just tell you. The night before last, or the night before that, — I forget which, — I was playing écarté with the Right Honourable the Countess of Bemerton, rather an old friend of mine, who is down here, and, by jingo! when I had cut the cards, I saw her take up the pack I had cut off, with the king of hearts at the bottom, and clap it smack under the other, just crossing it backwards and forwards, and leaving it just as it was. "Hullo!" says I, 'my lady : come, come — fair play's a jewel : — take the right pack — no shuffling !' 'Gad, you can't think how the people round looked ; but everybody seemed quite delighted with my presence of mind.

“ There is one thing I have to say ; if old Batley asks about the Exchequer bills, tell him they are at my banker's ; and if he wants any statement of accounts, say you cannot do anything in it till I come to town : from what I hear of his brother, he is in a bad way. I suppose he goes there again now, as usual. If anything happens in Grosvenor Street, I think he will find the widow (for the second time) a troublesome customer, for she never has forgiven the trick he played her about the jointure.

“ I expect to get away the day after to-morrow ; but as it is holiday-time, and the people here try to make it pleasant to me, I do not so much mind for a day or two. Lady Mary Sanderstead and Lord Harry are here as usual, and I suppose, as it is the fashion, it is all right ; but there never was anything so plain as that.

“ Mr. Mortimer tells me he is going to write to M. to-day, and, I suppose, upon that subject particularly. I never saw a man so low in spirits as he is: he walks about the room, groaning and rolling his eyes about like an actor; and yet, for all I can understand, unless Miss Mitcham is very ill-natured, I see no reason for it; for if M. does let him in for a few thousands, he has plenty to bear that without feeling it.

“ I shall write to old Batley to-morrow, and so you may tell him. If Hammond or Wood call, take care that he does not see either of them; and tell Wood that he must manage about the shares before Saturday — he will know what I mean. If Stephens chooses to come down handsomely, you may tell him I think I can induce the plaintiff to compromise; and, pray, mind about Atkinson's acceptance. You must tell him that it has been paid away, and will inevitably be presented when due, and you had better get young Fibbs, and any body else whose name Stephens does not know, to endorse it. There is no chance of his paying it, and the more names on the back of it the better. Of course, it will be renewed for fifty years with another name: we must not let him run too far.

“ If Cornet Tips comes about his business, say you cannot settle anything till I return to town ; but puff up the three horses : don't let him have a trial ; say the owner is in the country. I think, if we can get him to take two of them for a hundred and sixty guineas, charging him thirty for discount and agency, we may manage to do his bill for two hundred and fifty, which will leave him 40*l.* 10*s.* to receive in cash.

“ I suppose everything is alive and kicking at the ‘ S.-B.’ I assure you, I wish I was there every night of my life ; for here, although everything is uncommon genteel, there are no suppers ; and as for a glass of rum punch or whiskey toddy, you might as well look for it in the fish-pond as in the drawing-room. I see Thumpkin's farce was produced on Tuesday. It seems to have made a hit : I am glad of it. Thumpkin stands very high with the public already, and this will add to his fame ; it must be very gratifying to him. I was speaking of him here yesterday after dinner, and only think, Mortimer said he never had heard of him ! To be sure, M. lives quite out of the gay world ; but it is very surprising to me to find such ignorance where one should not expect it.

“ Mind and remember me to old Jacob. If you hear very bad accounts of Jack B., write by return, as I do not want the old gentleman to be first in Grosvenor Street.

“ Yours truly,

“ J. BRINNER BRASSEY.”

The next letter is, we perceive, from Mr. Wilkins to his brother Thomas.

No. XII.

“ DEAR TOM,

Sadgrove Hall, April 3, 18—.

“ You may fairly congratulate me upon the success of my operations with my gentleman. During the last few days he has given me several proofs of his confidence, and I have every reason to believe that, if I can get Crawley out, you will see me land-steward and chief manager of the Sadgrove property. I never could forgive Crawley's attempts to undermine me; and the opportunity having offered of making Mr. Mortimer suspect that all is not going right, it was too good to be lost.

“ You must know, there is one thing which has brought Mortimer and me nearer to each other lately than anything else perhaps could have done, and that is, his jealousy of his wife. Now, you pretty well know my opinion of the lady, who, if she had her own way, would absolutely starve the house, and who, I believe and I know, hates me, because she thinks I have more power over the master of it than she has. Once or twice she has tried to get me out altogether ; and I have found out that she has lately been warning her maid — that pretty girl I wrote to you about — against me : she had better warn her against somebody else. However, if I play my game well, as things are going on, I think the chances are, if there is any doubt as to who is to go, she is more likely to depart than me. You shall hear, and judge for yourself.

“ Mr. Mortimer, after having been desperately sulky, as I told you, about the lady and young B., has at length resolved upon taking some active measures about it ; and that he is in earnest you may be sure, because he has spoken to me upon it, and asked me sundry questions, to which, as you may be sure, I did not give very careless answers. He began by saying that he did not think it impossible but that he might break up his establishment here, and go abroad ; that circumstances might happen, — and so on ; and then added,—‘ If that were the case, after what you have told me about old Crawley, I think I should leave you here as land-steward and manager of the estate, with Crawley’s house and salary.’

“ Of course I thanked him, and finding him just in the humour to talk of what I knew was uppermost in his mind, I said I hoped the day was far distant when he should leave the place where he was so much beloved and respected ! — (he being, as I need not tell you, hated all over the neighbourhood) — and that led him on to say something more ; till he at last said, that what he alluded to was my mistress’s conduct, which gave him great pain.

My mistress, indeed !—the moment he said that, I was sure I had him safe. I never knew a gentleman go down stairs to make a confidant upon family matters, who was not regularly thrown over. I looked down, and affected not to understand him : at last, after again expressing his perfect reliance on me, he asked if I had not heard what he alluded to spoken of ? I hesitated, and hummed and hah'd, which hit him harder than if I had spoken out ; and after a good deal of boggling and haggling, he engaged my services to watch and discover the truth.

“ Now, the best of the thing is this : it is quite true that young B. has been a great deal here since I have been here, and, sure enough, is extremely free and easy with the lady ; but the change which Mortimer has seen in B., and all his anxiety to be up-stairs, and about where the lady is, is owing to his being over head and ears in love with her maid in question. Now, if I had told M. this, the mystery would have been solved, and Miss Mitcham, in all probability, sent off, and my lady quite cleared in her husband's eyes, which, you will please to observe, is not my game. I can see as far through a millstone as my neighbour. Mrs. Mortimer's temper is what they call a very sweet one, — when she is pleased; but when it flares up, I will leave you to imagine what it is. Being, as I believe she is, perfectly innocent, and uncommon fond of M., and bearing the domineering of his dear friend the Countess, the least thing said to her cross by M. sets her off into a bitter passion: this I know for a fact from Mrs. Woodgate, who was here with her before Miss Mitcham. Now, if I can work up my respected master to tax her to her face with being in love with B., you'll see what will happen; — she will do something that will make a sensation, as they say.

“You will perceive that this is not so difficult to bring about as you might at first imagine; it is only reporting to him what B. does in the way of slinking up-stairs, and sitting with his room-door open singing love-songs to his guitar; and going to see the children whenever he can get an opportunity, for the purpose of talking to Mitcham, and which seldom happens unless the lady is there too. I need not know that this is all meant for the maid — don't you see, Tom? And more than that, if I am not mistaken, the young gentleman has got a trick of writing notes to his beloved: — much may be made of this. And what puts me more at my ease in these manoeuvrings is, that Mortimer himself is so much in love with Mitcham, and she is so remarkably civil and engaging to him, that he never suspects in the least that B. is after her too, or that she encourages him, which she most undoubtedly does. I owe her no great deal of affection: she holds herself a little too high for me, but, I think, she must have a little pull down too: that, however, is matter for hereafter. If I can stir up a good sound quarrel between the two heads, my belief is, that what with the jealousy of B. on the one hand, and love for Miss M. on the other, — falling in with the lady's high spirit, — I shall do the job, and secure myself the uncontrolled command of this place, which, ten to one, M. will never see again, if such an affair takes place.

“I dare say, you think me a sad rogue;

however, it don't seem to me that you can find fault, considering how you yourself manage to feather your own nest. If I should want an anonymous letter or two to feed the flame, I will send you a rough copy, which you can write out, as nobody here knows enough of your hand to trace it; but, I think, B. is so young and so giddy, that I can trap him without much trouble. Colonel Magnus is expected, and I know he will do the scheme no harm. He is about as good a friend of the lady as I am. Some people say that he wished to be very civil, indeed, to her, and that her sharp refusal of his attentions turned him into an enemy. How that may be, I know not, but, I believe, he was always against M.'s marrying at all; at all events, he will do me no harm.

“ I am exceedingly civil to the old brute Crawley, and get Mrs. Stock to order nice things to be sent every now and then to his daughters. I am particularly kind to the youngest, who, as it strikes me, would have no objection to become Mrs. Wilkins. I shall humour this, because it puts the old fellow off his guard, and makes him believe that I do not know all that he has done to try to get me out.

“ I believe the lady’s father is dying: if this should send her off to Town, something may be done here in her absence. You may take my word for it, she shall get all she deserves from me for her past kindness. When you write, get somebody else to direct the letter, in case I should want what I mentioned. Remember me to all friends, and believe me

“ Yours affectionately,

“ R. WILKINS.”

The reader must begin to perceive that the “ wheel within wheel ” system was actively at work in the terrestrial paradise which seems to be so very strangely inhabited. A few more specimens will suffice to put him au fait as to their various and varying interests.

No. XIII.

FROM RACHEL STUBBS TO RICHARD TURNER.

“ DERE RICHUD, Sadgrov, April 8, 18—

“ I receved yewer kind letter on Fryday, wich fond me in good helth, but not spirts,—for sins yew went a whay i have encreased my sise hand tears. yew was kindust off the kind, and i cud have wukked has kitching-mad frum marwn to nite if yew had note gon; but sins yew want away iviry think sims to go rong. Muster Fishir, wich is, ginrilly speking, has gemmunly a Cock as is, scalds me iviry day for nott beasting the jints; hand Missus Stoak says I pays no manor of respict to her for nott gitting their diners better dun, wich I bleve, Richud, his owen to yewer habesence. If I thote all wot yew sed was sinsear hand yew ment it, i wud giv wharning hand go hat my munt; but praps, deer Richud, yew whas only roging me, wich wud be onkind and cruel. Tommus Wite is halways laffing hat me about yew, hand says i ham a grate fowl hif I wait for yew, for yew ment nuthink, and says it is, eye tim i was marred, wich he wood willinly do imself; but i says, no, Tommus, i likes yew well enuff, but as long has Richud Turner sticks to is bargin, i ham is, hand is aloan.

“ Wat i rites now for, his to hask yew wat yew wood lick me two do. my muther, i know, cud neerly funnish a rome for hus, and pot in a Tabbel and chares and a chest of drarers, hand a Bedd, wich is the most Hessensheal hof hall, hand wood be quite haggreable to the mach; hand hif we cood bitter hourselves buy aving a frunt were we cood sell Hoysters hand srimps, hand red Earrings, and sich lick, hin wintur; hand Soddy wattur, hand Pop, hand them kind of harticles, hin summer; i might tunn a peny wile yew wos hin playse, hif yew Kontinewd hin survice, hand hif not, do to-gither in bisness; wich wud save me from brileing mv fayse hin the roasting hand beasting, wick most do till I leave, or get a cocks playse in a small famly.

“ i know that Martha, the fot kitching-mad hat Sur Kristuffer Kaddingtuns, kepp cumpny halong with won of the futmun, hand she was marred, hand they sot up a Tomhandjery shopp, hand is reelizing a furtun; but i shud object to a Tomhandjery shopp because of the low confersation wich gose hon hin sich playes; has well has the smel of the Pips, wych makes me sike.

“ Deer Richud, i ham wiling to do hany-thing for yew, hand wuk day and night upon my ands hand neese to make yew cumfutable; hand i think we cud be very appy; but do not make a fowl hof me now, hand i will truss yew hall my life; hand my Muther his a woman well to doo, hand wen it pleses Purvidence to tack her up hout of this wuld will leve us sum-thing for a raney day, wich wud be a grate cumfut to me, appen wen it may.

“ i pot this hin a buskett, hand have sent yew three fools and a small Sammon cott; this mawning, for yewer Sister Lizy, wich altho i never seed hur i ham very fond hof from yewer subscription on her,—hif she will accept the trifles i shal be plesed, hand my love; hand wen yew are a heating the fools, do not forget her wich sent them.

“ Hif yew lick, yew can call on muther, wich is the darey at the korner of Jon street, and tawk maters over with hur. i am tird hof life down here without yew. i hope yew will get this safe. I have got Tommus Wite to rite the redress, not honely because he rites a good and, but to show im thatt we hare frends.

“ do let me here from yew ; and with true love and frenchship, in wich yewer sister his inklewded, beleve me, dear Richud, “ yewers internally,

“ RACHEL STUBBS.”

“ i ave pade the Courage hand Bucking.”

It is painful to think that, as far as we have yet gone, the most sincere and least artificial letter of the whole collection should be that of Miss Stubbs: it is characterized by a candour which the habits and customs of better society refine away generally to nothing. Miss Stubbs, the kitchen-maid, did not feel a warmer affection for Mr. Richard Turner, than Miss Rouncivall did for Mr. Francis Blocksford ; but nothing can be more different than the lines taken by the two enamoured ones under nearly similar circumstances. The only resemblance to be found between the letters of the victims is, in the proverbially feminine pithiness of their postscripts. We now come to another specimen of a different character.

XIV.

FROM FRANCIS MORTIMER, ESQ. TO COLONEL MAGNUS.

“ MY DEAR FRIEND, Sadgrove, April 3, 18—.

“ The postponement of your visit vexes me greatly : every arrangement has been, or will be made before this day is over, to put you completely at your ease. Pray, therefore, do not longer delay your departure from Calais, for I have need of your society and advice.

“ The state in which I exist is too dreadful to describe ; and the tortures I endure are in no degree alleviated by the recollection of your too justly realized prophecies, nor by the peculiar circumstances connected with the dreadful fulfilment. I have long doubted,—and feared; but those feelings have given place to something like a horrid certainty that I am hated by Helen, —and that she is loved by another, and that other — Francis Blocksford! Conceive this; only imagine the fearfulness of the combination.

“ I have felt more at my ease since I confessed to you the character and nature of the liaison between me and the Countess. Forgive me, my dear friend, for having so long and so positively denied the allegations of my sister upon that point to you, from whom I ought to have had no secrets; but recollect how many people are compromised by the admission: — and, after all, what is the admission?—for although I have never dropped a hint or an allusion to Helen which could awaken her suspicions in the smallest degree, I am convinced she is aware of the nature of my thralldom to the Countess; yet, from the course she is now pursuing, most assuredly not to its fullest extent.

“ A fate seems to hang over me, which at all times, and upon all occasions, ~~phases~~; ~~the~~ in the most painful positions: ~~Conceive~~ that when poor Batley — (and I say poor Batley, for I believe he is dying, and, although his conduct and character were never calculated to excite respect or secure esteem, we were once great friends,—would to Heaven the connexion between us had never been more intimate!) — conceive, I say, that when he took it into his head to marry the silly person who is now his wife, he should have selected the Bishop of Dorchester to perform the ceremony, he being the only human being alive who positively knows the secret which binds me to the Countess. We were at Florence—she was dying: he was, like ourselves, a visiter, and the only English clergyman there. She was given over: he visited her, — afforded her spiritual assistance, — and, in the firm belief that her recovery was impossible, she unburthened her conscience by confessing her sins; and, on what she believed her death-bed, confided to Sydenham the fact that her only son was not the son of her husband: — that son, as you know, is Francis Blocksford. Imagine, then, that of all the clergymen in England, — of all the bishops on the bench, — this very Sydenham should have been selected to perform a wedding ceremony at which that Mrs. Blocksford, as Countess St. Alme, and I, as the son-in-law of the matured bridegroom, were to be present.

“ You will now more plainly than ever see the racking difficulties in which the follies — vices, my dear Magnus, is the word, — of my early life have involved me. With this claim upon me, — for upon me the claim was, — Mrs. Blocksford, feeling herself sure and certain that when her husband, who was thirty years her senior, died, she should at least have so much reparation done to her feelings, — rendered more acute, of course, by the consciousness that she had confessed her fault, — as might be afforded her by marrying the man for whom she had fallen. There was the wound which burns and rankles! Instead of treasuring up my heart for her, the crowning event of my degradation occurred while yet her husband was alive; and when Amelia's divorce was followed by our marriage, Mrs. Blocksford was again at the point of death ! Her violence of disposition, acting upon her constitution, had nearly ended her career, — but again she recovered ; and seeing the impossibility of carrying her point, — that of becoming my wife, — she married the unfortunate man who has given her a title, likely, she thought, to secure her something like a place in foreign society, which might have been denied to the widow of an English merchant.

“ Strange coincidence, that circumstances, wholly unforeseen by me when I left her in Italy, should have combined to make me marry, — pledged, as I felt myself, to her ; and that she, being free some few years after, should again have married not six months before I became a widower ! There is in all this a mysterious counteraction of vice : — hopes, sown in guilt, bloom not ! And now, as a climax to the whole, I am assured, convinced by a thousand combining circumstances, my wife is devoted to —— ! — I cannot write the word. Magnus, the true Hell for a sinner is his own conscience !

“ Can you fancy any human being tortured as I am at this moment ? I associate much — nay, almost constantly in the morning, — with Francis. He speaks of Helen — strangely enough — as if she were a near relation ; and, when they are together in society, his manners to her are those of a brother ; but latterly he has become melancholy and abstracted, shuns company, and devotes his attention to Helen’s children. This strikes me forcibly : I understand the feeling ; I myself have felt it, as Byron has described it.

“ I have but one person in my whole establishment that I can trust,—my house-steward, Wilkins. You know how often I have proved his fidelity. Of course, I should not let drop one word to him likely to imply a doubt upon such a subject as this, but, in speaking on business with him, something occurred which led to it accidentally ; and although he said nothing, I saw from the honest fellow’s embarrassment, and from half-words which he inadvertently muttered, that the thing is talked of in the family. Now, just picture to yourself this! A suggestion to Francis to leave Sadgrove reported to his mother, would raise a storm which nothing could allay: a hint to Helen would, as I know from experience, be equally productive of violence, and an open rupture between us. The Countess, relying entirely upon her visits to us for admission into good English society, is already furious at not being invited this year. Helen's condition that she should not come, proves to me that she knows more than she ought to know about her, and moreover that she does not wish to have her here as a restraint upon her son. I fear much, my dear friend, that this state of things cannot long endure; I cannot bear it.

"Helen is devoted to her children; but more so, I think, since Francis has chosen to be so fond of them. Dear children!—why am I not permitted to be happy? Why — But I will not write thus. Come to me: you might, perhaps, speak to young Blocksford in a way which I cannot,—might rally him on his sunken spirits, and even altered appearance. I dare not trust myself to remark upon them to Helen.

“ My sister writes me word that she has abandoned her intention of coming to England, and, as far as I can see, has resolved upon spending her days abroad. Her dear friend has married both her daughters, — one to an English squire, and the other to a French officer; and has, jointly with Mrs. Farnham, taken a chateau, as it is called there, near Beaugency; a pretty enough village on the banks of the Loire, nearly midway between Orleans and Blois. Helen expresses the greatest anxiety that she should pay us a visit; and, if I could feel that she was acting sincerely by me, I should say it is most right and proper that her sister-in-law should be of our circle, — (although as a permanent visiter I must beg to decline her,) — and would write, and press her to come and bring her friend; but I feel that Helen is only playing a part, and I shall say no more about it.

“ We have but a few people here, and those old stagers. Lady Mary Sanderstead leaves us in a day or two, and, of course, so does Harry; the Bembridges are also on the wing

I am dead-sick and tired of them all ; and yet the common observances of society force me to appear perfectly delighted with their presence. Brassey will, I hope, be here when you come ; not because I wish his stay to be long, but because, I trust, your absence will be short. Forgive me this letter, so full of my own cares and troubles ; the only relief I experience is in telling them to the only person in the world to whom I would permit them to be told.

“ Ever yours, dear Magnus, F. M.”

In this extremely candid letter of Mr. Mortimer we find him concealing from his bosom-friend one or two points of great importance, which, however, involve conduct on his own part not to be admitted even in a communication so particularly unreserved. He dwells with acute sensibility upon the probability of Helen's attachment to Francis, but sinks altogether his own unequivocal admiration of Miss Mitcham, to whom he makes not the slightest allusion. In ordinary cases there would be nothing extraordinary in a man not mentioning his wife's maid in a letter to a friend ; but, considering the position of the gentleman to whom this confession of sins and sorrows is confided, it is rather remarkable that one of the leading causes of the writer's distraction and unhappiness finds no place in its pages ; neither do we find any reference to what appeared by Wilkins' letter to his brother,—the commands of the writer to that worthy to keep watch over the conduct of his wife ; nor of the implied reward for his exertions in the appointment of land-steward at Sadgrove : in fact, Mortimer, in the midst of his candour, trusts Magnus only with facts and surmises which affect his own view of the present state of things, and favour the course he seems to have chosen to adopt.

We have nearly come to the end of our letters ; but one which follows is curious, as illustrative of the enthusiasm of artists in whatever line they labour, and of the importance which every man, let his calling be what it may, attaches to the craft generally, and his own personal share in it particularly. Mr. Fisher, the cook, writes thus to a Fellow of the same Society.

“ MY DEAR SIR,

Sadgrove, April 3, 18—.

“ I acknowledge your kind letter of Thursday, which I should have answered sooner, but really have had no time. I thank you for your idea of the pigeons à-la-maréchale. I have for several years contemplated something of the sort myself; but the suggestion of frying the ravigotte in butter, and moistening it with consommé and Spanish sauce, is perfectly new to me. The shalots are very tempting, I admit; but, in looking at the general state of society, I am apprehensive that anything more than a transient suspicion of their actual presence must be avoided.

“ As to the question you ask with regard to my position, I confess I am not entirely satisfied: there are scarcely sufficient opportunities here of putting myself forward. We have generally the same set of people staying in the house; and it naturally occurs that, when each is the case, a professional man is more driven to his resources to produce a variety, than when the company change more frequently. I begin to suspect that Mr. Mortimer himself has no great taste in art. I often ask if they have heard him express any opinion of such and such a dish to which I have devoted my energies, and find that he has not even tasted it, but has dined on the roast. This is, I confess, disheartening, but I compound for it under the circumstances, that mild air and gentle carriage exercise have been recommended me.

“ A Mr. Pash has been down here, who appears to have an exceedingly good idea of things generally. We had several very interesting conversations upon the subject of my matier, and he was good enough to favour me with a recipe for Sauce à-la-Pash, as he says, M. Ude has been so kind as to name it in his general classification. It is evidently the work of an amateur, but there is a character of genius about it. I have subjoined a copy of it: — with a quarter of a pint of good stock, ~~in~~ the partridges, of course, on the top, ~~over~~ a slow fire in stew-pan, to sweat. When the partridges are enough, moisten with consommé, and throw in trimmings of mushrooms and truffles, a little mace, a clove or two, three or four allspice, a bay-leaf, and, if you dare venture, two or three young onions. The whole of this is to boil till the partridges are enough; then strain the consommé; add some bechamel with some game-glaze, and about a wine-glass full of thick cream, to keep the colour light: then fry some truffles, and put them by themselves in a stew-pan till you want to dish-up your fillets.' Now, although I detect a little plagiarism in this, still, as I say, for an amateur, it shows both research and genius.
‘ Two pounds of veal, three or four slices of ham, the backs and legs of two partridges,

"The real truth is, I feel mortified, at being kept down by a want of ardour in our patrons. We hear a great deal of Scott, and Southey, and Byron, and Wordsworth; and folks talk of Lawrence, and Reynolds, and Wren, and Rennie, and all the rest of it; but what is poetry, of which not one person in ten thousand is a judge, to cooking? Painting is an absurdity by comparison. A Macedoine of mine involves more research than one of Martin's finest pictures; his is all oil — monotonous: Turner's finest drawing does not cost him so much labour as one of my omelettes aux fines herbes. Look at St. Paul's or Waterloo Bridge, — why, my dear sir, the men who build these things know, that when they chip stones to a certain size, and lay them in certain spots, and bed them in a certain quantity of mortar, there they will stay, and the execution will be exactly like the design, and all will go well; but with us, — Lord bless my soul! how is it possible to answer with any certainty for the effect of our feuilletage? — how ensure the just proportions of a crocquette, or the exact flavour of a remoulade? We work, comparatively, in the dark, my dear sir; hence the difficulty of making a reputation, or maintaining one when made.

“Greatly are we indebted to M. Ude for his elaborated history of the rise and progress of cookery. Little did the world think, till that work was published, that Martin Luther was the first great reformer of the kitchen!

What does he say too, my dear sir, of Gonthier D'Andernach, who raised the culinary edifice, as Descartes, a century after him, raised that of philosophy? — Both introduced doubts, — the one in the moral, the other in the physical world: Gonthier is the father of cookery, as Descartes is of French philosophy. Then came Catherine, the daughter of Lorenzo de' Medici. Look at Henry de Valois, — to which illustrious man M. Ude attributes the invention of the fricandeau! What does the eloquent author say upon this point?

“ ‘ Did ever any one suspect the efforts of genius which the invention of so simple a machine as the wheelbarrow cost Pascal, its inventor? Schroeter, in his excellent treatise on Astronomy, vol. ii. considers the invention of the spinning-wheel to be more surprising than the discovery of the great laws of Nature by Kepler, — that the squares of the times of the revolutions of the planets are to one another as the cubes of the great axes of their orbits: — and Schroeter is right. As to my own opinion,’ says M. Ude, ‘ respecting the superiority of these three productions of human reason,—the wheelbarrow, the fricandeau, and the spinning-wheel, I should give the fricandeau the second place, which, if my memory deceive me not, is the rank M. de Fontanes assigns to the ‘Martyrs’ of M. de Chateaubriand between the two finest poems of the intellectual world.’

“ We are much indebted to M. Ude’s research upon this all-important subject. The way in which he puts down Henry the Third of France, and gives thanks to Providence that Charles the Ninth had been preserved by having the immortal De l’Hôpital placed about him. Henry the Fourth justly falls under his censure ; and, in fact, as you know, he dates the art of making sauces from the age of Louis the Fourteenth : till that period, strange and disgusting as it may seem, meat was either roasted or broiled ! Now, what I have before said personally of myself about sauces, and the delicacy and difficulty of treating the subject, you will see by M. Ude, that St. Augustin said before me, ‘ Omnis pulchritudinis forma unitas est,—therefore there must be unity in every good sauce; there is harmony of taste, and colours, and sounds: if it were not so, why should the organ of taste be wounded by one composition, and so agreeably flattered by another? To appreciate a sauce, a delicate palate is as necessary to these kinds of cooks as a refined ear to a musician. Father Castel wanted only nine scientific eyes to feel the harmony of his colours; and a skilful sauce-maker requires only an experienced palate to taste the harmony of the flavours of his ragouts:—Pash has this quality to perfection.

“ You will, I know, forgive my quoting from our great contemporary; but I am an enthusiast, and hope some day to make a name which shall last: in fact, my principal motive in worrying you just now is to ask you to keep your eyes open if anything should turn up which you think may suit me, and which I could with propriety accept. Mine, at present, really is ungrateful work; and except, as I have already said, for the air and exercise, I could not have endured it so long as I have. We have a nice light claret here which agrees with me, and Wilkins and I are d'accord altogether. Of course, I see very little of what is going on in the family, but, from what I hear, the lady and gentleman of the house lead a sort of cat-and-dog life; and Wilkins himself, who informs me that he is in great favour with the latter, is, as he hints, likely to marry one of the prettiest girls I ever saw, — a Miss Mitcham, — a kind of shabby-genteel dependant of the former. The establishment is altogether mal monté; but, if I had more extended means, I could, I think, do myself good in the way of experiment. You know my old principle of always trying my success; so that, as I admit one or two of the presentable people to my confidence, we make an extremely agreeable committee of taste. One thing I would suggest to you: — should you hear of any situation which you think may suit, that you should altogether sink my ever having been here professionally. Date back from the Duke's; and remember, since I left his grace, I have been in Worcestershire for the benefit of my health.

“ Keep me in mind, and believe me always “ yours,

WALTER FISHER.

"P. S. — There is one remark, by way of note, in M. Ude's book, at page 412, under the head 'coffee,' which has made him extremely unpopular in the lower departments of sundry establishments; of course it affects nothing above the servants' hall, and therefore matters little: but, after recommending his readers to buy a certain description of coffee biggin, he says, — 'If it is the first time of using it, you had better make a little coffee in it for the servants, to season it; for, when first used, coffee-biggins generally smell of turpentine.' This, I am told, has created a strong sensation."

There are still many more epistles to open and read; but, however amusing their contents might prove, we must restrain our curiosity. What have been submitted are enough to throw a perfect light upon the state of affairs at Sadgrove, and to justify even the most assiduous in their opinions of worldly friendships and the sincerities of society.

CHAPTER II.

THE 3rd of April has been so frequently before the eye of the reader, as the date of the letters which have been submitted to his perusal, that it will not require much calculation to ascertain that when the party, still lingering at Sadgrove, assembled at breakfast on the 10th, a week had elapsed since the despatch of that heterogeneous packet into which he has been permitted to pry.

It may easily be conceived that seven days' fermentation of such materials had produced something. Magnus had arrived; the Bembridges, aunt and niece, were gone; but Lady Mary Sanderstead remained, and, mirabile dictu! Lord Harry Martingale remained too. The attorney had winged his flight to town; Harvie and Blocksford were yet at anchor.

It was about half-past twelve o'clock, and the breakfast-party still lingering in inaction, when the Sadgrove bag arrived, and all its members were, of course, anxious and delighted to hear from their dear friends, and enjoy the fruits of that intercourse, the merits and sincerity of which they have themselves so satisfactorily established in the mind of the reader. Helen, of all of these, was however most affected by the event; and, in order to conceal the emotion which her efforts to stifle her feelings had excited, rushed from the room before she had half finished the letter which she had first opened.

Mortimer followed her to her boudoir, where he found her violently agitated, and in tears.

"What is the matter, Helen dear?" said he.

"Mortimer," sobbed the weeping wife, "my poor father is dying,—he is, he is!"—and, as she spoke these words, she felt that, when he was gone, she should be in the wide world alone, without one friend upon whom she would rely for counsel or advice. In mind and sentiment her husband, even now, was a stranger to her.

“What does he say?” asked Mortimer.

“He!” said Helen,—“oh, dear, dear father, he can say nothing! — he is past writing to me! — he is gone from me, — perhaps at this moment! — my only parent that I ever knew, who loved me beyond himself! She tells me that he constantly repeats my name, — calls on me, — prays for me!”

“My dearest Helen,” said Mortimer, “in Heaven’s name, if you wish it, why not go to him? You have hinted such a desire two or three times within the last few days; but the worst of it is, you never speak out. You know your will is law here. Do you wish to go to him?”

“Oh! Mortimer,” said Helen, “do not ask me: the choice is one of pain and peril. I dread the alternative. He wishes to see me; that wish is enough to overcome all other feelings of mine: but I would rather — I can do no good — I would rather recollect him, as I last saw him, in all the gaiety of his kindness and good-humour, — than have impressed upon my mind the eternal recollection of his beloved countenance — changed by the heavy hand of sickness, — perhaps of death! — And if he were dead when I reached town! — Oh, no, no, no; I couldn't bear it!

“Do as you will, dearest,” said Mortimer, with a look and in a tone which perfectly conveyed his personal indifference as to the election she made. “I know enough of the sort of feeling which agitates you now, to question whether you had better not wait the result, and” —

“The result!” said Helen, — “then he is to die! — and if he asks for me, — if he calls upon my name, and I am not there, and they tell me of it hereafter, my heart will break, — it will, Mortimer, it will!”

And she clasped his neck, and hid her face on his bosom, and her tears flowed again in torrents.

Was hers a heart to wound? — was she a wife to scorn and suspect?

“Why not go then?” said Mortimer.

“How can we leave our friends?” said Helen.

“We need not leave them,” cried Mortimer;

“ I may remain. What on earth can prevent your starting for London two hours hence? Take your maid and a footman ; and, if you dislike travelling at night, sleep at Oxford or at Henley on the road, and start again in the morning.”

“ And leave my children,” said Helen, “ and go without you ?”

“ I,” said Mortimer, “ could not well leave home ; I have a dread, too, of such scenes ; and besides, — that uncle of yours ! — in fact, I feel that I should rather be in your way. That you should feel towards your poor dear father as you do, is not only natural, but perfectly right and just : the case is different with me.”

Helen could not help thinking that the readiness with which Mortimer gave his sanction to her solitary journey, was not quite in accordance with that sensitive tenderness which she had always fancied, before marriage, was characteristic of the fond, devoted husband : but her enthusiasm had been frequently damped before ; and, as her whole heart and soul were engaged in the anxiety to see her beloved father before he died, she grasped at the possibility of realizing her wish at all hazards and all risk of discomfort and inconvenience.

“If it were not for the children,” said Helen——

“Why,” said Mortimer, as if the thought had that moment stricken him for the first time, “if you feel anxious about them, Mitcham might stay with them, and you might”——

“No,” said Helen, but without even thinking beyond the one object, “I could not do without Mitcham.”

“Faith!” said Mortimer, with one of those gloomy smiles which so frequently played over his countenance, “I believe you ladies have as much difficulty in changing a maid as a monarch has in changing his minister.”

“But,” said Helen, “I have no option: I have no other person at hand to take her place. No: the dear babes have their nurses; and you, my beloved Mortimer, are equally devoted to them with myself.”

“Yes,” said Mortimer, exceedingly angry at something which Helen could not even surmise, although the reader perhaps may, "I will act as head-nurse in your absence."

"I wish, Francis," said Helen,—"devoutly wish, that I could persuade you to go."

"What!" said Mortimer, with another of those looks which cut her to the heart, "and leave the dear children entirely to the tender mercies of the servants!"

"I know," said Helen, "the fatal, yet natural, dislike you have taken to my uncle; still"——

"Helen," said Mortimer, "do not talk of him to me: you hate him as much as I do; and nothing is so abominable as a hypocritical avowal of affection for near relations for whom one does not care sixpence. That you should desire to see your father, as he desires that you should, is, as I have already stated, most natural. My advice is this: it is impossible that you can get clear of Sadgrove before three o'clock; do what I before suggested;—go on as far as Oxford, rest yourself there; start early in the morning, and you will be in Grosvenor Street before noon."

This plan exactly accorded with poor Helen's wishes ; but the more and the more calmly her husband discussed it, the more her heart sank within her ; because, in the philosophical manner in which he treated it, and the readiness he evinced to accede to her wish, and even went into the details of the journey, she perceived fresh evidence of his total indifference, not only as to her presence or absence, but as to the fate of her beloved parent, which had so often before agonized her.

" We are reduced to a very small party here," said Mortimer ; " and although Frank Blocksford will, no doubt, miss you, Lady Mary will not, if Harry remains. Magnus will endeavour to amuse the young gentleman, and Harvie and I will make it out remarkably well. I suppose you will not stay till the funeral."

Helen felt herself choking : she was unable to speak, — to look at her husband, who, in one sentence, had, as we know, intentionally inflicted a thousand wounds. The allusion to Francis Blocksford at such a moment; the triumphant announcement that the (to her) odious Magnus was to take charge of that youth; the inference that he sanctioned under his roof, and in the society of his wife, such a liaison as all the world, except Helen, understood to be existing between Lady Mary and Lord Harry — never brought to entire perfection till Lord Harry's father had made successful interest, at his persuasion, with the Admiralty to get her ladyship's husband a ship on a foreign station, for the command of which he was about as fit as the coxswain of the Lord Mayor's barge in a voyage from Blackfriar's Bridge to Strand-on-the-Green would be to navigate the Red Sea in a seventy-four. As for the service, that was one thing; as to society, that was another: all that was wanted was Sanderstead's absence from home; and, as the motive was duly appreciated, the Mediterranean was thought the safest pond for him to play about in; and so thither he was sent.

But if these hints and innuendoes, — first, as to Francis Blocksford, which Helen felt, however undeserved they were; and next, as to the sort of society which her husband, for their own objects, encouraged under his roof, — irritated and wounded her, the way in which he spoke of the certainty of a fatal result to her father's illness was still more painful. We, who have seen Mortimer's letters, and know the dreadful character of his thoughts and suspicions, can duly appreciate the tone and spirit of his remarks, sweetened and softened in manner, and even that equivocal: but it would be hard, indeed, to give any adequate description of his unhappy wife's feelings, when she heard him consign to the grave, as if it were a matter of course, the father she adored, and the man with whom he had himself lived for years, upon terms of perfect intimacy and worldly friendship.

The course Mortimer adopted determined her as to that which she should take. If he had followed up the line upon which she had at first set out, and strengthened her in her view that it would hereafter be more consolatory to look back upon her father as she had last seen him, than to have impressed upon her mind for ever, his image stretched on the bed of death, she might, fearing that all would be over when she arrived in town, have relinquished the journey, and have waited the event at Sadgrove ; but the moment that she found her unqualified love for her parent scoffed at, — the certainty of his immediate dissolution established, — and the whole affair, nearest to her heart, treated as a matter of indifference, her filial love was roused beyond control, and she decided, in a tone much more of command than she was generally accustomed to assume, upon undertaking the journey as soon as it was possible to begin it.

“ Women are strange creatures ! ” said Mortimer. “ Well, I will order the carriage to be at the door at three ; you will get to Oxford by nine or ten : there I advise you to sleep. If you prefer it, you can get on to Henley ; but, at all events, stop there, because you will save the fatigue of a long journey, and arrive in town at any early hour you choose to-morrow, which will be infinitely more convenient than getting to Grosvenor Street in the middle of the night."

"I care for nothing," said Helen, "but reaching home in time to see my dearest father."

"Home!" said Mortimer, — "ha, ha! So, then, your heart has never been at home here, Helen!"

It drives one half-mad to hear such things said, and at such a time, by a man like Mortimer, to such a being as Helen. She heeded them not, and only said,—

"I call my father's house my home; surely, dear love, there is no harm in that."

"Harm!" said Mortimer, "oh dear, there is no harm in anything you say, Helen! But there, I had better give orders about the carriage, and have horses sent for:—and you take Mitcham then, of course?"

"Of course," said Helen.

"Which of the footmen shall go—your own or Richard?" said Mortimer. "I ask only because Richard, I think, is the steadiest."

"Do whatever you like, dear Mortimer," said Helen. "I shall be ready at three, and I do assure you I thank you a thousand times for letting me go; although I would thank you ten thousand times more if you would go with me."

"Ay," said Mortimer, "that is quite another affair. Well, then, I shall go down and announce your projected departure, and make all necessary arrangements. Let us, however, first look at the babes; I promise, Helen, to take the greatest care of them during your absence."

Helen, too much delighted to be associated with her husband in such a labour of love, felt grateful to Heaven that it had bestowed on them children, who seemed to form the only real solid link which bound them together.

They proceeded to the nursery, which opened into Helen's dressing-room; and as Mortimer gently pushed open the door, Helen following, his eye glanced upon Francis Blockford, who, the moment he heard the rattling of the lock, was evidently making a hasty retreat from the apartment. The nurse was there, but not Miss Mitcham.

In one moment the fitful smile which had gilded Mortimer's countenance was turned into a look of the deadliest gloom; and an oath, muttered not quite so softly as to pass unheard by his wife, escaped his lips. In an instant the children, and everything else in the world except the object of his suspicion, was forgotten.

"Wasn't that Mr. Blocksford who went out?" said Mortimer to the nurse.

"Yes, sir," said the woman; "he generally looks in as he goes by to see the dear children."

Mortimer spoke not for a moment; then, turning to Helen, his countenance quivering with emotion, he said,—

"If Francis has ascertained that they are well, I conclude that I need not enquire after them myself. I'll go and see about the carriage."

And, suiting the action to the word, away he went with an affected carelessness and gaiety of manner, leaving Helen in a state of surprise and misery, which, however, were greatly modified by her one thought of the impending calamity which, under all circumstances, seemed to her to be fraught with the most important consequences: and so in truth it was; but we must not anticipate.

Little need be said, after what has already been disclosed, to convince the reader that Helen, under the fearful circumstances by which she was surrounded, had a worse chance of coming out unscathed from her trials, than even the innocent queen after her walk over the hot plough-shares.

“ Rely upon it,” said Magnus to Mortimer, when he reached his own room, and imparted what he had seen as to the evanishment of Blocksford, “ the case is a bad one. To a person like myself, my dear friend, accustomed to view things on the great scale, and to whom matters of first-rate importance are confided, the underhanded trickeries of small men are immediately evident; of course, when I say small men, in the present case I mean men of small experience. I say again, the case is a bad one: rely upon it, that sort of open-necked, guitar-playing, song-singing, sketch-making, poem-writing person, at his age, is the most dangerous in the world."

"That is all true," said Mortimer; "but Helen"——

"Helen!" said Magnus, — "Helen married you, as you know, out of pique. Did not that father of hers"——

"Stay," said Mortimer, "he was our friend; he is dying."

"That is in the course of nature," said Magnus; "but did he not actually send after you to Brighton?"

"All that is past," said Mortimer: "I speak only of the present."

"Well then, for the present," said Magnus, "Mr. Blocksford is too much here,—infinitely too much, especially after having once excited the feelings you so fervently described in your last letter to me. I have watched, — carefully watched, the workings of his mind: I have seen an interchange of looks between them: her spirits have sunk in due gradation with his: — he is in love."

"In what a position do I stand!" said Mortimer. "How am I to act? — what am I to do? A word, — a hint, — a doubt expressed, would fire the train: — at this juncture, too, while Helen is oppressed with grief for her father!"

"There is a good deal of acting in that, I take it," said Magnus. "I speak out, because you desire me to do so, and because I would guard you against deception. May she not assume a greater degree of sorrow for her father's illness, in order to cloak the real cause of her depression? May she not seek the journey to avoid the scrutinizing gaze with which she must be conscious I watch her actions? She is conscious of that, I know; and" —

"And, after all, we may be wrong,—unjust," said Mortimer, relentingly. "However, at this period, nothing can be said or done in the affair. She is plunged in grief, and her filial feelings must be respected. If, in her absence, Francis could be spoken to, — told that people remark his familiarity, — his constant residence here, — his recent depression: I couldn't touch upon the point, but a friend might."

"A friend will," said Magnus. "You have put this affair into my hands: I am resolved to maintain your honour. While Helen is away, I will draw young Blocksford, as you call him" —

"Hush, hush!" said Mortimer.

"I will draw him, I say, into conversation, and lead it to the topic on which I propose to descant. He has honoured me by taking a fancy to my society, — a family failing, — and, I think, is inclined to place reliance on me. I will discourse him gently upon the great caution necessary to be observed in society by attractive young men in their intimate friendships with young married women: in fact, I will advise him whilst I search his mind, and, as I find the fact to be, so shall I act; and if—as I have little doubt I shall—I should be able, from the ingenuousness of nineteen or twenty," —

"More than that," said Mortimer; "he was of age yesterday. I did not touch upon the point, although I recollected it well; nor did he, which I own surprised me."

“There must have been some reason for that,” said the amiable Magnus: “however, twenty or twenty-one, I flatter myself I shall come at something like the truth: and then, if in his confessions there should appear anything to justify your natural suspicions, — not as to himself, but as to her, — I will suggest, as a matter of honour to him, his making some excuse for immediately leaving Sadgrove, which, while Mrs. Mortimer is absent, will be less noticeable, and stop the matter in time to avoid all the fatal effects of éclat.”

“Excellent councillor!” said Mortimer: “you can, indeed, do all this, and I may be saved, — Helen may be saved. I may, perhaps, be restored to tranquillity even by the very course of examination to which you propose to submit him: it may all be innocence and” —

“It may,” said Magnus. “Trust to me: it requires a grasp of mind to take these subjects into one great general view.”

“But,” said Mortimer, “let me implore, let me entreat, let me conjure you, by no implication, no allusion, no suggestion, permit the slightest hint to fall from your lips which could lead the thoughts of this dreaded object of my solicitude to the fact of our wretched consanguinity. I was mad — I was raving mad when I permitted his mother to force him thus upon me: and yet, Magnus, I am not lost to all natural feeling. If I dare own the truth to him; — but no, no! — there falls his mother's reputation! — there perishes his respect for her whom he now loves! Oh! my friend, this is all just retribution; it is all as it should be. Let then the sinful suffer, but let us save the innocent, — if innocent yet they be; and spare the Countess degradation and disgrace, and keep her son from a knowledge of" —

"My dear Mortimer," said Magnus, bending his body gracefully forward, and grasping from his ample box a "gigantic pinch of snuff," "do you suspect me of any gaucherie like that?"

"I think," said Mortimer, — (and it is wonderful to see how much the man conceals who, to use Mr. Wilkins' expression in his letter to his brother, goes down stairs to ~~make a~~ confidence,) — “ I think, from what I have heard, that all may yet be well ; that the extremest point to which our charges can go is indiscretion : — but the state of doubt ”——

“ Shall be ended forthwith,” said Magnus. “ Leave the affair to me. Rely upon it, this journey to London is a providential occurrence, and we will take advantage of it. You go see all the preparations made for the lady’s departure ; stifle your feelings ; check yourself if you feel inclined to abruptness ; seem as kind as ever. Remember, we have yet but slight grounds to go upon ; let the fault of harshness not rest upon you. I will go with you, and take my share in the ceremonies of the day.”

If one did not know that all this was true, and had happened, would it be believed that a man of Mortimer’s sense and spirit — of Mortimer’s high breeding and knowledge of the world — could have consented to talk with any other man, no matter whom, upon such a subject and in such a strain ? — that jealousy, — and that most peculiar jealousy of others, originating, as we have already seen, in diffidence of himself, — could so far have debased his mind, and changed the nature of his feelings, as to have thrown him into the power of two such persons as Colonel Magnus, the mightiest of his friends, and Mr. Wilkins, the meanest and most subservient of his domestics?

So it was ; and, after what we have seen and read, it is quite clear that the efforts of the subordinate, whose association in the league against his wife Mortimer never mentioned to Magnus, were in no degree inferior to those of his more important, although unconscious, confederate.

Mortimer, who seemed to have placed himself implicitly under the tutelage of his exemplary friend, acceded to all his suggestions as they related to his apparently attentive and affectionate superintendence of the proceedings connected with Helen's departure; and the Orestes and Pylades of Sadgrove joined the half-disjointed, half-expectant party, who, unsettled by the announcement of their fair hostess's departure under such painful circumstances, considered it absolutely necessary at least to postpone their arrangements for the day's diversions till she was fairly out of sight, their tone of sorrow being taken from their host, who merely regretted that Helen's feelings prompted her to make the journey which, from the contents of her mother-in-law's letter, he felt assured would be too late to secure the object she had in view.

And, while all this worldly scene was acting below, what was passing in the neighbourhood of that nursery which had been the scene of so many whispering interviews between Francis and Mary Mitcham, and out of which so many materials for mischief had been collected.

Francis Blocksford no sooner heard of Helen's projected expedition to London, than he resolved that the crisis of his fate was at hand. Mary was going with her : the thought of her departure, painful as it was of itself, was coupled in his mind with the certainty of losing her eternally. Left alone with her mistress, the secret would be betrayed. Won by Helen's kindness, and melted by sympathy for her grief, she would own to her the whole history of their attachment. The idea was madness. His heart and mind were filled with the one thought: his head ached, — his limbs trembled, — his hands were icy cold, — his eyes burned: see her he must. Five, six, seven times did he make errands for himself to his apartment upon the staircase, which led, as we already know, also to the nursery and to Mary Mitcham's room: he saw her not. He would have stricken some chords on his guitar to attract her attention, but that Helen was weeping and in sorrow. Again he paced the passage, and not again in vain: at length he met the object of his search and solicitude.

"Mary, Mary!" said he, in a tremulous voice, scarcely articulate, his tongue cleaving to his mouth, — "for Heaven's sake! Mary, one moment."

Mary shook her head, and, laying her finger on her lip, passed on. He re-entered his room, — affected to look for some book or paper, — sat down as if to write, — did write, and the tremulousness of his hand came out afterwards in evidence against him. Again Mary passed his door, or would have done so ; but, maddened by the thoughts which, we know, occupied his mind, he drew her into the room, and closed it.

“ Hear me, Mary,” said he, clasping her to his heart: “ I am this day my own master, ready and resolved to redeem my pledge, — ready, too, to fulfil my promise made to you. You love me, and you have owned it : the crisis of my fate has arrived. You leave this with Helen in an hour. If you go with her to London, if you see your mother there, you will consult her upon this attachment of ours, — for we both love, Mary — she will give you worldly reasons why you should tell Helen, and take her advice ; she will tell Mortimer ; Mortimer will tell my mother, and we are lost ! — and, by Heavens ! Mary, unless you wish to have my blood upon your head ” —

“ Oh ! Mr. Blocksford,” said Mary, trembling like a leaf, “ don’t speak so loud ! I hear Mrs. Mortimer in the passage : let me go, for Heaven’s sake ! — If you do care for me, let me go ! ”

“Care for you, Mary!” said Francis, —
“what words are these? Listen, listen: now, be calm,—be still! love,—be still! This journey gives us the opportunity of all others to be sought for:—there’s nobody coming, love! Hear me: Helen stops to sleep at Oxford to-night; when she is gone to rest, you will be free. I will be there; a chaise shall be ready to receive you, and we will start thence to Scotland, where you will become mine for ever. Thence we will return, and the knot once tied, my mother, I know, will forget and forgive all; and if she do not, dearest, I have, as I have already told you, a fortune adequate to all our wants and wishes; and if she refuse her sanction to our marriage, I am content to possess your love, even if her future hatred is entailed upon me.”

Mary, dreadfully agitated, said nothing, but left her hand clasped in that of Francis; at length the word “Impossible!” passed her lips.

“Mary,” said Francis, drawing her still closer to his heart, “the moment has arrived:—do you hate,—do you detest me?”

“No, no!” said Mary, bursting into tears, “why should I?”

“Then,” said Francis, scarcely able to give the question utterance, “do you love me, Mary?”

Her hand remained clasped in his: the grasp was not relaxed.

“Let me go, Francis, — pray, let me go,” said the trembling girl.

“Francis,” whispered Blocksford to himself, — “she calls me Francis!”

“Mary,” said he, “in a hurried yet resolute tone, “I trust you, — I rely upon you, — at twelve to-night at Oxford! I shall easily find out at which inn you stop. At twelve! — for Heaven’s sake, do not deceive me!”

Mary decidedly pressed his hand, and rushed out of the room. Blocksford threw himself upon the sofa, and hid his eyes: — was it a dream? — was it reality? Did he, in truth, possess the treasure he had so ardently sought; or, at least, was it so immediately within his grasp. It seemed like a bright vision; but his delight, even in the moment of triumph, was accompanied with a sensation of dread at his long hoped-for success. The instant he felt himself secure, there arose in his mind a crowd of thoughts which had never before entered it, — cares, responsibilities, and a thousand incidents, involving even the details of the expedition. As far as these were concerned, he resolved, lest he should have no other opportunity of enlightening the fair companion of his intended excursion, to write a note, which he would convey to her as she was starting, which would ensure the success of the adventure; and accordingly, with as much composure as he was master of, he scrawled these lines:

“ It is natural, dearest, that your feelings should be deeply affected at this moment; and I own that nothing but my conviction that this is an opportunity not to be lost, would have induced me to be so presumptory; but, as you have made me the happiest of happy men, few words may save us much trouble. Whether you stop at ‘The Star,’ or

‘The Angel,’ of course I shall know: trust to me for the rest, and fear nothing: I, of course, have plenty of friends in Oxford, and at either house. I believe, knowing your kind and tender heart, that parting from the dear children will give you the severest pang of all; but you must not let that feeling get the better of those which you own I have inspired. Heaven bless you! Before this time to-morrow we shall be safe from the persecutions of all spies and enemies. Remember, — twelve!

“ Ever yours,

“ F. B.”

He might, however, have spared himself this little address; for, his door being still ajar, his ears were delighted with a soft, short cough, which he recognized to be that of his Mary, and which was of a character to which the Faculty have assigned no particular designation. He started up: sure enough Mary was there.

“ Go down, — pray, go down!” said she.
“ Mrs. Mortimer is gone down already; they are just going to luncheon : if you stay away, we shall be discovered. I shall die ! — Oh ! pray, think better of it ! — some other time !”

“ No, no, no !” said Francis, “ you have promised. Mind, I shall be there : somebody will give you notice : — it will be all right, rely upon it.”

“ There, then, go now, for Heaven’s sake !” said Mary. “ Oh ! what on earth will become of me !”

“ Luncheon is ready, sir,” said Mr. Wilkins, who had taken upon himself a new character upon this special occasion, and fatigued himself to volunteer the announcement, for what purpose Francis did not exactly understand, but Mary did. Blocksford said, “ Very well,” with an extremely ill-acted carelessness ; and Miss Mitcham looked upon the house-steward, as she felt, for the last time, with a scorn and contempt in which there was no acting at all.

“ Upon my word ! my dear Mrs. Mortimer,” said Lady Mary, “ you are undertaking a great performance, — a journey of a hundred and twenty miles, alone !”

“ Oh ! nothing,” said Helen, “ when the heart is interested ; besides, in these days of civilization, a lone lady is not likely to meet with many perilous adventures, while protected by the presence of her maid and a manservant and two postillions.”

“ Upon my honour !” said Lord Harry, “ I do think one of us ought to offer himself as cavalier, for I am quite sure that our being here prevents Mortimer’s going with you.”

“ No,” said Mortimer ; “ Helen knows my reasons for wishing her to leave me behind. I should, I assure you, make no ceremony, if that were not the case ; nor need our both going at all disturb you so long as Colonel Magnus and Mr. Blocksford are here : they know the ways of the house, and are quite capable, either one or the other, to be my locum tenens.”

“ Why, what on earth is the matter with you, Frank ?” said Captain Harvie to Francis, as he took his “ seat at the board.”

“ Matter !” said Blocksford, — “ nothing is the matter with me.”

“ Did you ever see anybody looking as he does, Mrs. Mortimer ? ” said the Captain.

“ Come,” said Francis, “ don’t worry me ; I want some luncheon.”

“ Your hand is not over steady,” said Magnus, casting a significant look at Mortimer ; — “ what has flurried you ? ”

“ Nothing,” said Francis, colouring crimson.

“ Umph ! ” said Mortimer, whose glance at Magnus Helen saw ; and too quickly guessing its import, — too well knowing the cause of her arch-enemy’s hatred, — her cheek, pale as death before, caught the infection, and fired with rage. This really inconsequential, but unfortunate exhibition, was not lost upon Lady Mary or her friends, who all exchanged looks, none of which were lost upon Mortimer.

The struggle with her contending feelings was too much for poor Helen, who burst into tears, and quitted the table. Mortimer did not follow her ; Lady Mary did, — for she knew enough of all the history to pity, although her great delight was only to alarm her. The carriage was shortly brought to the door; and then the wretched husband — for what else was he? — proceeded to his still more wretched wife to announce its arrival.

During the incidental preparations for the departure, Magnus watched poor Francis like a lynx: he hoped, in the activity of his surveillance, to pick up some of those “trifles light as air,” upon which he might give something like a colouring to the suspicions he had all along endeavoured to awaken in Mortimer’s mind; and he was most fortunate: for poor Francis, the very first day after he had legally arrived at years of discretion, having done, perhaps, — at least in a worldly point of view, — the most indiscreet thing he possibly could do, was in a state of nervous agitation far beyond the Colonel’s most sanguine hopes. Full of the anticipation, — not of his future life, for that was by far too remote an object for his young and sanguine mind, — but of his arrangements for the day and night, and the journey, and the marriage; and of the thought that she who was to be the partner of his existence, the sharer of his fate and fortunes, was to be, before his eyes, packed up in the rumble of a carriage in a hot day, with a huge plush-wearing footman, who, because the seat was so narrow, would, for mere convenience sake, in all probability carry his arm round the slender waist of his fair companion. What must have passed in his mind? Magnus recommended an extra glass of wine after luncheon; but Francis refused it, and exhibited signs of peevishness and irritability when the Colonel joked him in his way, which had never been previously observable in his manner: — all of which convinced the said sage Colonel that he was doing wonders in the way of discovery-making.

The time fast approached for poor Helen's departure. Her parting with her children, whom she loved better than life, and from whom she had never yet been separated, was, indeed, a trial; and Mary Mitcham was so much affected by the scene, that Mortimer went the length of taking her hand, and begging her not to agitate herself, — that she would see them again in a few days, — perhaps two or three; at which remark the poor girl burst into a fresh torrent of tears, and Helen wept more than before; and in this fashion the lady of Sadgrove took her leave.

She leant on Mortimer's arm as she passed through the hall, and bowed her adieux to the few guests left, for she could not speak; and when she was seated in the carriage, and the door was about to be closed, she motioned with her hand that Mitcham should accompany her inside; and this mark of her consideration — not altogether unselfish — threw poor Francis into a new fit of terror. Mary was to be left tête-à-tête with Mrs. Mortimer for six or seven hours, on the eve of the deciding movement of her life, — and that movement to be made in conjunction with so near and dear a friend of the family: — was it possible that she could play the hypocrite so well as to conceal this important — most important fact from her who had been so unboundedly kind to her? He doubted, — he dreaded, — and would have almost preferred the rumble and plush, with his arm round her waist into the bargain, to the powerful influence of such a woman as Helen over such a girl as Mary in the way of inducing a confidence: but he might have spared himself all his anxiety. Mary never let fall either remark or observation which could in the remotest degree lead her mistress to suspect anything more than she always had suspected, namely, that Frank thought Mary an extremely pretty girl, as indeed did everybody else; and that he had told her so, as indeed Frank, in his frequent conversations with Helen about her, had confessed. Mary's only remark upon the subject during the whole journey, which was at all to the point, was, — "that Mr. Blocksford was a remarkably nice young gentleman, and she wished him all sorts of happiness."

They are, however, gone; and while they are on their journey, at least as far as Oxford, we shall have plenty of occupation in watching the proceedings of other and very different people.

CHAPTER III.

It would be difficult adequately to describe the different feelings of the different persons who witnessed Helen's departure from the door of Sadgrove. Mortimer resolved to make use of the period of her absence in endeavouring to satisfy himself by all means, fair and unfair, of the justice or groundlessness of his long-cherished suspicions. Wilkins, his creature, determined to avail himself of the same opportunity to confirm those suspicions ; while Magnus, whose disappointed pretensions to Helen's favour had rendered her doubly hateful to him, proposed to himself to discuss the subject with Blocksford only just so far as might strengthen him in the belief of her attachment to him, if he found the feeling of affection for her really there, — in order, by the results, to realize the anticipations of Mortimer, the hopes of Wilkins, and the schemes of Mr. Brimmer Brassey, by again breaking up the establishment at Sadgrove, and thus reducing its master to a state of single blessedness, consequent upon a separation from his wife; in which position Magnus, with his satellite, the attorney, would have him as completely under their control as he had formerly been, when Magnus had, in earlier days, involved him in all the misfortunes, except one, which had debased his character, and destroyed his peace of mind.

Magnus knew Mortimer's failing, — his leading, ruling passion, it might be called, — the morbid sensibility which the consciousness of his own demerits had excited in his heart and mind, and which, as we already know, could be roused to something like positive madness by the belief (which more or less continually existed in different degrees) that he was despised, not only by the world, but by Helen herself; and with the knowledge of her character which the reader has, in the course of his perusal of these pages, probably obtained, and which Magnus completely possessed, neither the one nor the other could be at a loss to perceive that the mode of treatment which Mortimer adopted to uphold his fair fame and dignity, was precisely that which was least calculated to produce the desired effect upon his wife, devoted, as she was, to him in the outset of her matrimonial career, warm and affectionate as was her heart, and kind and generous as was her disposition.

Mortimer made no allowance for the innocent gaiety of a girl, — for what else could she be called? — who had been courted, sought, flattered, praised, followed, and cried-up to the skies in the best London society, whom he had suddenly withdrawn from the sphere which she brightened and adorned, into a retirement which she was prepared to enjoy, if the seclusion had been enlivened, as she, in the romance of her mind, had hoped it would be, by the affectionate confidence of the man she loved, and that interchange of feeling and sentiment to which she had looked forward as the leading charm of a married life.

But no: she had been disappointed. The total estrangement of the neighbouring gentry on their first arrival at Sadgrove struck her forcibly; for it must be confessed, as, indeed, it already has been, that Helen's notion of retirement included the presence of an agreeable society, although, when she found that circumstances prevented the enjoyment of it, in her case, she was the first and readiest to disavow the feeling, and declare her dislike of country visitings. And from whom did she learn the reason of this defection, but from the last woman on earth who ought to have been near her?

Does anybody suppose that Helen, brought up as she had been in the full glare of worldly knowledge, could long continue undeceived as to the nature of the claim — influence we will not call it — which Madam St. Alme asserted at Sadgrove? Even if her own innocence had blinded her to the character of the intimacy which at some time or other must have existed between Mortimer and the Countess, the amiable activity of her friends was not wanting to enlighten her.

Was it by this association, strenuously insisted upon by Mortimer, that she was to be taught to respect his morals or admire his virtues? Was it by his almost insane destruction of his once favourite retreat, the Fishing-Temple, the chief ornament of his place, because Helen had inadvertently made some remark upon his earlier attachment to it, which he misconstrued into a reproach, that she was to estimate his mildness and moderation? Was it by his marked uncourteous violence, upon more than one occasion, to young Blocksford, for whom Helen entertained feelings of genuine friendship, chiefly excited by the kindness which Mortimer himself generally exhibited towards him, and the interest he appeared to take in his welfare, that he expected to seal her lips or close her eyes, so that she might neither speak to Francis nor look on him? If so, he was wrong, — radically wrong, in his system and principles. Helen, conscious of her rectitude and the purity of her intentions, would rather increase than diminish her kindness to Francis the moment she found herself wounded and insulted by Mortimer's suspicions ; — and so in every case where their tempers clashed.

After the birth of her first child, the boy, she felt that she had a new claim upon Mortimer's affection, and, to do him justice, his attachment to his children was enthusiastic ; but still the same gloom hung over him which had before oppressed him : the second, as we know, was a girl, but she never excited so much of his affection as the elder one. The main point he carried, in consequence of these additions to his family, was that of prolonging his stay in Worcestershire, and during one of the three matrimonial years they did not visit London at all.

All this would have suited Helen, because the professing nun at the altar, on the day when her long tresses are shorn from her head, and her glittering ornaments consigned to oblivion, is not more determined to fulfil her vows than Helen was to assimilate herself to Mortimer's tastes and feelings; but she required in return that confidence and assurance of regard which she knew she merited. Perhaps, — who knows? — if they had at once proceeded to Sadgrove, and the meeting between them and the St. Almes in France had never taken place, all might have been well: it is, however, now too late to speculate upon possibilities or probabilities, we have to deal with facts; and truth compels us to say, that after the most implicit devotion to Mortimer through a long and serious illness, when, as the reader already has been told, she watched the life-breath quivering on his lip, his earliest remark, when his returning health gave sufficient vigour to his mind to make it, was, that he was afraid his young friend Francis must have missed her society very much.

That was a crisis; it was from what then occurred that Mortimer discovered the danger of trifling with his wife's feelings. Her anger at that moment knew no bounds. It was an awful sight to see one so young, so beautiful, and so inherently good, torn and tortured by rage which amounted to frenzy. Nothing but the dread of causing the cruel man who had inflicted the wound a relapse, prevented her at that moment from flying from Sadgrove to her father: her feelings had way, and a torrent of tears relieved her agony of mind. Mortimer was alarmed,—subdued,—and penitent; and endeavoured to assure his wretched wife that what he said was meant in perfect good-humour. Helen insisted upon it that Francis should never more visit the house; but Mortimer persuaded her into the relinquishment of this condition by again assuring her of the playfulness of his remark, and by pointing out how injudicious it would be to exclude him from their society; a circumstance which would naturally call for explanation, and which, although perfectly absurd in itself, might give some colour to a story to which, in point of fact, there was not the slightest foundation.

So completely did Mortimer live for the world — out of which he had removed himself — that the idea of any “ history ” with which his name was connected getting abroad, agitated him just as much as did the apprehension of the occurrence of anything like “ a scene ” at home. Peace, upon the present occasion, was restored ; but it seems probable that one of the conditions of the treaty was, the exclusion of the Countess from the Sadgrove circle during the following season.

Well, — revenons à nos moutons, — Helen is gone. To all eyes, but especially to those of Mortimer and his friend, the extraordinary agitation of Blocksford was evident ; and the looks which these two important personages of the drama interchanged during the forenoon were eminently expressive of their thoughts and feelings upon the subject.

“ I hope,” said Lady Mary Sanderstead, “ dear Mrs. Mortimer will meet with no accident or worry on her journey. I am used to travelling alone : if I could not muster courage for that, while poor dear Sandy is abroad, I don’t know what I should do.”

“ In these days,” said Mortimer, “ as I told Helen, there are not many perils to be apprehended.”

“ Come, Blocksford,” said Magnus, “ let you and I take a stroll down to the river. Is the fly up yet ?”

“ I — I ” — stammered Francis, “ have some letters to write ; one to my mother, — and ” —

“ Dutiful boy !” said Lady Mary, with one of her most captivating looks. “ What a charming thing it must be to have such a son ! — don’t you think so, Mr. Mortimer ?”

“ Delightful !” replied the master of Sadgrove, not quite master of himself, inasmuch as he knew enough of Lady Mary Sanderstead to know that she seldom wasted her words, or said anything without some meaning.”

“ I hope,” said Magnus, “ that when his boy grows to be of the same age as Mr. Blocksford, he will be equally dutiful, and that we shall be all alive to see it.”

“ Is the Countess coming over ?” said Lady Mary carelessly to Francis, knowing perfectly well that she was not.

“ I really don’t know,” said Francis, perfectly convinced at the same moment that she had not the slightest intention of doing any such thing.

It would be a waste of time to linger long over these minor manifestations of worldly feelings, while so much of real importance to all parties most immediately concerned is impending. The amusements of the day went on as usual, and, as we have seen, Helen was not much missed. At the accustomed period the carriages, the horses, and everything else which contributed to make up the amusements of the morning, were all at the door, as usual ; even while poor Helen was travelling from scenes of gaiety, in which her heart reposed not, to those of grief and sorrow, in which it was so deeply engaged. What then? Lady Mary, when seated in her delightful little carriage, with the two fat, long-tailed ponies, which she loved to drive before her, and Lord Harry, whom she loved to lead, by her side, thought no more of, and cared no more for, the weeping Helen, than she did

—let me take care of what I say,—for the veteran Captain Sanderstead, with the coconut head, who was pottering about in the Mediterranean, and whom she had married only because he was next but one in remainder to an earldom, blessed, as many an earldom is not, with an adequate fortune for its maintenance.

To anybody else there might have arisen some difficulty, as being the only lady left at Sadgrove; — not so to Lady Mary: she could not go to the Fogburys before a certain day, and she had nowhere else to go to in the intermediate time. In a woman of spirit, there is nothing like independence; and the moment she establishes a character for that truly English quality, she may, of course, do what she likes. Having dropped a few “natural” tears for Helen’s misfortunes, she soon resumed her wonted gaiety, and volunteered the command of the house, which Mortimer, with one of his sweetest smiles, accorded her; and so she was installed accordingly. The inability of the Fogburys to receive her exactly on the day which she selected, she was compelled to endure the society of Colonel Magnus, whose presence was rendered doubly hateful to her by the consciousness that he was a universal spy,—a watchman-general of everything that was going on; still, as the evil was irremediable, she resolved to fasten herself upon the master of the house during her brief stay, in order, if possible, to divert the attention of the lynx from the liaison which had been notorious,—even in the newspapers,—for many years.

All her ladyship's gaiety and playfulness, however, went but a little way to divert Mortimer's attention from the marked abstraction of Blocksford. His almost sharp refusal of Magnus's invitation to walk; even his evasive answer about his mother's visit to England,—a new proof of his powers of dissimulation,—struck deeply into Mortimer's mind; and every succeeding ten minutes of the period in which Frank remained in his presence, added to the conviction on his mind that Helen's departure was the cause of the unquestionable alteration in his conduct and manner.

N'importe was the motto,—and away went Lady Mary and Lord Harry in the pony phaeton,—away cantered Harvie,—and away rode together Mortimer and Magnus,—Francis having, for the first time, declined their society. What the conversation — what the surmises of the two friends might have been, far be it from us even to conjecture. All that is necessary for us to know is, that having enjoyed — (what sort of enjoyment it was can best be appreciated by reading in the magazines or newspapers of some respectable gentleman just deceased, who for many years had enjoyed an exceedingly bad state of health,) — their itinerant séjour, they returned to the house, where matters went on much as usual till dinner-time.

The effects produced by the first toison are not evident or visible: but when, upon this special occasion, the second had been rung, and the extra ten minutes' law had been given, and dinner was actually announced, and so Mr. Francis Blocksford appeared, great, indeed, was the consternation of the master of Sadgrove. Nobody knew when or whither the young gentleman had gone: Mortimer was fearfully agitated; Lady Mary, however, preferring her soup to the suggestions which were made by divers and sundry persons in and of the household as to his destination, said, with one of the sweetest simpers into which her brightly-vermilioned lips could twist themselves, — “I really don’t think it either fair or hospitable to make such very urgent enquiries after a gentleman of Frank’s age.”

The mystery in which his sudden departure was involved was exceedingly amusing to Lady Mary, to Lord Harry Martingale, and to Captain Harvie; it was not at all unpleasant to the magnificent Magnus; but it was torture to the master of Sadgrove.

Not a sound that could reach the dinner-room fell upon his ears but he hoped it might be somehow connected with the return of Francis. He sat and talked, and even smiled, but the extraordinary disappearance of this hated — yet naturally loved — rival was an event against which he could not successfully rally; and Lady Mary being the only lady left, and being not at all anxious to immure herself in the drawing-room alone to wait the "coming men," she lingered longer than usual at the dinner-table, until her stay seemed to Mortimer eternal, so anxious was he to make some further enquiries after the missing guest.

At length her ladyship quitted her seat at the board, and Mortimer, excusing himself to the men, hastened to his own room, whither he instantly summoned the trusty Wilkins, — as, indeed, Wilkins was perfectly well assured he would. From his evidence, delivered, as the reader may easily imagine, in the manner best calculated to give it point, and tend to produce the effects by which he hoped to aggrandize himself, Mortimer gathered that Blocksford had ordered one of the saddle-horses, — Mortimer's horses! — and having first despatched a boy with his "carpet-bag," — in all probability to Worcester, — had told the groom who brought out the horse, that, if he did not return that evening, the boy who had taken the bag could bring the said horse back to Sadgrove.

“The boy with the horse is not returned?” said Mortimer.

“No, sir,” said Wilkins, “I believe not; — but — I — should think it very improbable that Mr. Blocksford will be back to-night.”

“Why?” said Mortimer; “what are your reasons for thinking so?”

“I don’t know, sir,” said Wilkins; “but”—

Now the villain did know; he knew, as certainly as we do, that Francis Blocksford’s departure from Sadgrove was consequent upon Mary Mitcham’s journey towards London; and, although he did not know the particulars of the arrangement for carrying Frank’s mad scheme into execution, he could in one instant have relieved Mortimer’s mind from the growing anxiety with which it was tortured, and, by the mere mention of the girl’s name, have diverted his thoughts into another channel, and saved that which might have been a happy family from misery. But that was not his game: he was playing for the ruin of old Crawley, and the possession of his vacant stewardship; and the fellow had the hardihood to thank Providence for having afforded him so speedy, so unexpected, and so sure an opportunity of gaining his point.

Shakspeare, who has better said than anybody all that can be said of the passion of jealousy, has described its workings so minutely, that it would be as vain as useless to expatiate upon its power over Mortimer. For months, — nay years, — he had been brooding over the one subject which had so long since taken possession of his mind. That he had subdued his feelings, — or at least the expression of them, — generally speaking, is true; but the feelings were still at work: and now that he connected the disappearance of Francis with the excursion of Helen, so far from being surprised at the result, he seemed to consider it what he might have expected; and, in that mood, scarcely repented that he had not sooner interfered to terminate their intimacy.

“No, no,” said Mortimer, “you are right,

— he will not come back this evening : — no, no ; he will never come back to this house !”

“ I don’t think,” said Wilkins, — “ I — it would be best to wait, — it is not nine yet ; — and ” —

“ Oh !” said Mortimer, “ I shall wait, — what else have I to do ? She went at three, and ” —

“ Who, sir ?” said Wilkins, with a look of honest anxiety.

“ My wife !” said Mortimer.

“ But, sir,” said Wilkins, “ you don’t think that Mr. Frank is — is ” —

“ I do think so,” said Mortimer, pale as death, and trembling with emotion, — “ and so do you !”

“ I shouldn’t have ventured to say a word on the subject,” said Wilkins ; “ but — it is strange.”

“ Strange !” said Mortimer, — “ it is certain — sure as we are alive here in this room : — let me but wait to know it. However, I must go to the dinner-room ; they will wonder what keeps me from them. Let me know the moment Francis comes, — ha, ha, ha ! — he come ! — no, no : — let me know when the boy returns with the horse, — for that will be it : — but not a word to anybody else !”

Mortimer returned to his guests, not much calmed, as we may easily suppose, by this interview ; and Wilkins, who pretty well anticipated the results, proceeded to his room to arrange the accounts of the establishment, which were under his special care, in order that, if his master should put his long-desired threat of breaking up his establishment and flying from England into execution, no impediment in the way of business, at least as far as his department was concerned, should be interposed to the fulfilment of his intentions.

By ten o'clock, as had been anticipated, the boy and horse arrived. Coffee was being served in the drawing-room : Wilkins made his appearance, and crossing over to Magnus, who was expatiating upon the splendour of the view from one of the windows of one of his houses, gave him a letter, and, as he was quitting the room, stopped before his master's chair, and in an under-tone mentioned that the boy was come back.

If he had plunged a dagger into his master's heart, he could scarcely have done him a greater injury. The realization of his own prophecy, — the fulfilment of his own anticipations! — prepared, as he thought himself, and resolved, as he believed himself, upon the line of conduct he should adopt, the news was worse than death. He started from his chair, and hurried again to his room, bidding Wilkins follow him thither.

“There's a letter from Mr. Frank,” said Wilkins.

“A letter!” cried Mortimer: — “where there's life there's hope! — we may be saved yet. God grant it may be so! What letter? — who has it? — where is it?”

“I delivered it to Colonel Magnus,” said Wilkins; “it was directed to him.”

The next moment brought the Colonel to the door of the room.

“Is Mr. Mortimer here?” said he, seeing only Wilkins.

"Yes, sir," said the man.

Magnus entered the room, trembling with agitation, and looking as pale as usual, and even paler than his friend.

"It is so! — I know it all!" cried Mortimer.

Magnus paused, — spoke not, — but, not aware of the humiliation of Mortimer, and the consequent importance of Wilkins, waited as if he expected him to leave them. Wilkins, however, seemed inclined to stay.

"Leave us!" said Mortimer. Wilkins obeyed, but his move was not a long one: he went no farther than the lobby, and his ear was forthwith at the keyhole.

"Frank," said Magnus, you must be firm; — you must bear up against it."

"Merciful Heaven!" said Mortimer.

"See what the serpent you have cherished says!

"DEAR COLONEL,

"You must have wondered at my refusal to join you in your ramble this morning: at that moment my fate was sealed. The step I have taken is ruinous, — but it was irresistible. How I can ever palliate my conduct to Mortimer, or to my mother, I know not. Pursuit is, however, useless : before this reaches you, I shall be far on my road to Oxford, whence we start across the country. London is not our destination. I should not have written, but that apprehensions might be entertained of her safety. Our minds are made up to the consequences.

“ Yours, in a state of distraction,

“ F. B.”

Mortimer sat with his eyes fixed on his friend as he read this most unfortunate letter. Magnus had been so short a time in the house, since his last return to it, that he had never noticed either the beauty of Mary Mitcham, whom he had never seen before, or the attentions which Blocksford paid her ; and Mortimer, conscious of a somewhat too tender feeling towards the girl himself, had neither mentioned her in his letters to Magnus, nor equivocal corroborations. Magnus, anything connected with Mitcham tending to the real meaning of the word, it could refer to none. He certainly had reason to look forward. If he had known enough of another construction he would openly have said so. He would have instantly produced a satisfactory answer. That was exactly what he

That he did not do, the probability of its referring to him entirely, is most true.

it was liable, to the ruin of Mortimer's peace of mind. But what will be said of that basest of human beings, the listening menial, who having overheard the reading of the letter, and satisfied himself that its construction would almost miraculously further his vile and villanous objects, raised himself from his knees, and, hurrying to his room, filled a brimming glass of port wine, and drank, by himself alone, with fiend-like exultation, a bumper to the success of his odious machinations ?

Mortimer heard the letter out, and, when Magnus had concluded, he threw himself back in his chair, and covered his face with his hands : Magnus himself, overcome by a thousand contending feelings, no matter what their character, spake not.

“ My friend,” said Mortimer, starting up, “ my heartstrings are bursting ! — my brain is on fire ! I have lost her ! — she is gone for ever ! — and with whom ? God is just ! .Now am I taught to feel the tortures I have myself inflicted. When I triumphed, and Amelia was the partner of my flight, her husband felt as I do now. What did I ~~conceive~~ ^{conceive} ~~my friend!~~ ^{my friend!} — what of that? ~~Had he not been~~ ^{Had he not been} my friend, the opportunities ~~would not have~~ ^{would not have} occurred which led to his ~~disgrace~~ ^{disgrace}! ~~I am dishonoured!~~ ^{I am dishonoured!} ~~by him~~ ^{by him} who — Oh! is this to be ~~borne~~ ^{borne}? ~~Will~~ ^{Will} my mind hold? — will my ~~senses~~ ^{senses} ~~remain~~ ^{remain}? — What am I to do first? I ~~know~~ ^{know} ~~it all!~~ ^{it all!} — saw it, — fool that I ~~was to suffer~~ ^{was to suffer} it! But it is now too late! — ~~all that is past~~ ^{all that is past} — what is to be done, is for the future? —

There can be no question but that the existing state of affairs was such as to ~~place~~ ^{place} the best and wisest counsellor. The relative position of Blocksford and Mortimer; Magistrate knew, must prohibit any appeal of that nature to which it is the fashion to ~~resort~~ ^{resort} under ~~similar~~ ^{similar} circumstances; but he knew ~~enough~~ ^{enough} of Mortimer's temper and character, ~~and~~ ^{and} ~~enough~~ ^{enough} in the convulsive agitation of his features, to assure him that, let his decision be what it might, the result would be terrible.

After a pause of a few moments, Mortimer, apparently more collected, said,—

“Magnus, leave me : my course is resolved upon. My heart is broken ; but I have deserved all that has happened : it is right it should have happened. I will act for myself ; no human being shall be involved in the responsibility. Go back to the drawing-room, — say I am unwell, — that I am gone to bed, — that we shall meet in the morning : — but do not drop a hint, — do not whisper, — do not even look so as to create a suspicion about Helen. I have not been unprepared for this : my arrangements have been made for some time in anticipation of her defection. But what meanness ! — what hypocrisy ! — and how unlike her ! — the anxiety — the pretended mad anxiety to visit her father ! — and now to discover that she has abandoned him, and the whole scheme to fly from London with this wretched boy ! Go, Magnus, go ; let us part for the night ; to-morrow you shall see me : I shall be more at rest, — calmer, more tranquil.”

“ I really do not like to quit you, my dear Mortimer,” said the Colonel, “ under such circumstances. I ” — for I have much to shall pass my lips

remember that no
my sufferings or d public news of the e the next day. Save of condolence from t here. To-morrow I course, Lord Harry. that,—can join in the brave and worthy ma service;—and yet—
—mercy! Leave me, me; but, as you va
my secret."

After some ineffectu part, Magnus acceded rally resulting from the lamentable event which had occurred. Magnus accordingly returned to the drawing-room; and before the party, reduced as it was, separated for the night, every individual composing it knew that Mrs. Mortimer and Frank Blocksford had gone off together. Each one of the guests had his joke against his host, even though the sneer were clothed in sympathy, and the ridicule tempered with pity; but Lady Mary at length broke up the conclave by sagaciously observing, "that if men who had excellent wives did not know how to take care of them, they had nobody to blame but themselves."

THOSE who have waters of the mi,
the tempest rage has the effect at sea. In the strug wind lords it ove holds them in sul rage and passion.
beyond expression when Magnus had collected, one mig wholly occupied by one would have sus
his sufferings at

have been permitted the privilege we have assumed, of looking into that letter-box which we have examined, what ruin might have been averted !—what misery avoided ! But no : the wickedness of man must work its way, and treachery still triumph over the best of us. To fancy that, having pre-determined his wife's guilt, and thinking every woman vicious for that he had found some to be so, he should, upon the "trifle light as air," (for so it was, inasmuch as a second or third reading of the giddy boy's letter to Magnus must have somehow explained the fatal mistake,) adopt the course which was eternally to blight his hopes of peace and happiness, and turn the amiable Helen a solitary outcast upon the world ! Yet so it seemed destined to be.

After Magnus left him, Mortimer proceeded to the nursery : he found his children sleeping soundly. When they first met his eyes, his agonized mind was relieved by a burst of tears, which he in vain endeavoured to conceal from the nurse who was watching over them. She saw him weep, but of course said nothing to him, — only remarking to the maid, after he had left the room, that she really did not till then, think Master cared so much for Missus, — attributing this burst of sorrow to the temporary absence of Helen in London.

From the nursery he proceeded to his wife's boudoir. The first objects that met his eye were the two drawings which Francis had made nearly three years since for Helen; these, not with the violence of rage, but with all the method of sober sense, he dragged from the ribands which held their frames to the wall, and tore into atoms. He next searched for her writing-desk, feeling all the while like a thief in the night, and dreading lest he should be interrupted. He found it not, for it had been put into the carriage with her dressing-case and other personal requisites. This added new fuel to the flame; it was in their writing-desks that wives left the records of their sin: — Amelia's writing-desk rose up in evidence against him on his trial, — but no; — Helen was more artful than Amelia, and had taken the precaution to remove the proofs of her criminality.

Poor Helen ! — there was not in her writing-desk a line that might not have been read at the market-cross at mid-day ; she did not even know that Mitcham had been so attentive as to give it to the servant to be packed in the carriage : however it was gone.

He passed into their bed-room, and stood and gazed wildly and vacantly around him, his limbs trembling, and the cold dew standing on his forehead ; again that agonizing pang which all of us have felt when a loved object has been lost to us, and all the scenes of happiness which we have enjoyed together have flashed into the mind, shot through his heart. What ! was he never to behold her more ? — NEVER ? — oh, dreadful word ! — And where — where was she at the moment he was calling on her name ? He flung himself upon the bed, and madly seizing the pillow she had abandoned, clasped it to his breast, and covered it with kisses.

Why, — why, in the name of all that is dreadful, should these people be eternally parted ?

All this evil, — all this misery, although alone were n

the love and felt when she was a fate in i butive justice, timer the pang had been his Mortimer's cor have taken his future home, th
been avoided.

the renewal of Countess St. Al association with

Had Helen n timacy with the timer would in exemplary sister, Mrs. Farnham, had been suffered to subside, and he had consented to her visit to his young and high-spirited wife at the time she volunteered to come to her.

“If,” they say, is a valuable peace-maker ; but, in our history, the very recollection that “if” such things had been done, and such things had not been done, it would have terminated differently, almost puts us out of patience: our business now is to see what will be done.

Having quitted the bed-chamber, Mortimer proceeded down the back-stairs to his own room ; and, as he passed a door which opened into the hall, he heard the merry laugh still ringing in the drawing-room where his friends were still assembled. The echo of their mirth made him shudder : it would be many a day before those walls resounded with joyousness again ; — and how much of retrospect that anticipatory thought involved may easily be imagined.

The night that followed this was a night of horrors. Mortimer, having wreaked his vengeance upon the memorials of the unoffending Francis, rang his bell, and summoned Wilkins to council.

"Lock the door!" said Mortimer, ashamed and afraid of being detected by Magnus in this confidential association with this creature.

Wilkins obeyed, delighted to find that he had superseded even the Colonel.

"To-morrow I leave this place,—for ever!"

The words were music to the miscreant's ear.

"I take my children with me," said Mortimer; "but this you are to keep secret till the morning. I have tried you,—found you faithful:—you have my confidence. I had promised you that if—and I did foresee it—I should ever be driven to this extremity, you should be left here in charge of everything. I will prepare such a paper as shall ensure you this control. Tell me, have you been near the rooms which that—I cannot describe him—Blocksford occupied?"

"I have been there, sir," said Wilkins, "and, as you suggested, placed his clothes and papers in order."

“Papers! — were there any letters? — any ——?”

“Yes, sir,” said Wilkins, with an affected hesitation.

“Go, — go,” said Mortimer, — “fetch me those papers; and, mark me, — not to-night, but early in the morning, tell some of the women-servants to pack up my wife’s wardrobe.”

“Sir!” said Wilkins, with a well-acted start of horror.

“Ay, all,” said Mortimer. “Her maid is gone with her, but let any one of them, I care not which, pack up everything that is hers, — jewels and all, if they are left: let Bennett do what Mitcham would have done if she had been here: — I cannot even look upon the records of other days: — have them all packed up, and Mr. Blocksford’s things you can arrange. Send them all off; send them — I know not where — best to her father’s, whose sickness and illness are all a fiction, — all a feint. I will write to him myself during the night: I shall not go to bed. You will see to all this: get ready whatever accounts are necessary to be settled, and to-morrow I start for the Continent with my two poor innocent babes — but again remember, not a word to anybody : you shall have ample powers left to manage everything after my departure.”

It would be impossible to describe the savage joy which animated the heart of this unprincipled wretch when he found that all his hopes and expectations were on the point of being realized. It seemed not only that fate and fortune had favoured him, but that Mortimer was actually playing into his hands in a manner almost calculated to make him sceptical as to its reality.

That Mortimer was virtually mad at the moment, there can be but little doubt : his placidity of manner, combined with the firmness of purpose which we have already noticed, was absolutely awful. To have seen him and heard him making arrangements for the morrow, the effect of which would be his eternal separation from his wife, and the utter ruin of all his hopes of domestic comfort or tranquillity, in a tone and temper suited to the commonplace directions for a short journey, or even an excursion of pleasure, would have startled anybody who was aware of his habitual violence, and had seen him in those paroxysms of rage to which he was subject. Wilkins was perfectly astounded, and could scarcely bring himself to believe that his deluded and betrayed master really intended to fulfil all that he now projected. It will be seen that this active minister determined to leave no effort untried to bind him to his purpose.

Having sent Wilkins to his manifold duties, and having had a few minutes' conversation with Magnus, who came to him, on his way to his room for the night, in which he referred but slightly to the all-engrossing subject, appearing anxious to act entirely for himself, without either seeking advice or involving others in any responsibility, he parted from him with the ordinary phrase of "We shall meet at breakfast;" and, as the door closed upon him, felt relieved from a world of anxiety by finding himself again free and unfettered to take his own course. That it was a desperate, — a cruel course, no one that knew Mortimer's heart and temper, when acted upon by circumstances like those in which he had so suddenly found himself placed, could doubt.

In the midst of his doubts and disbelief, of poor Helen he had, as we have seen, satisfied himself that the illness of her father, if not altogether a fiction, had been greatly exaggerated in order to bring about the journey. The affectionate anxiety of his unhappy wife to see that father, — to hear his last sigh, — to receive his last blessing, was construed into an ardent haste to put her criminal designs into execution; and her ready acquiescence in his desires, or rather her obedience to his command, that she should go without him, was perverted into an unquestionable manifestation of her eagerness to be rid of his society.

Convinced of the justice of his views, and the validity of his reasonings, he resolved, in his uncertainty as to the destination of Helen and her beardless paramour, to write to Batley himself the history of her crime, detailed in all its extremest horrors, and his final renunciation of her, consequent upon its commission. Thus would he wreak his vengeance upon him who, according to his friend the Colonel's account, had hunted him down as a husband for his giddy, flirting, and portionless daughter; and stab the parent while he spurned the child.

“Nothing,” says Lavater, “is so pregnant as cruelty. So multifarious, so rapid, so ever-teeming a mother, is unknown to the animal kingdom: each of her experiments provokes another, and refines upon the last: though always progressive, yet always remote from the end.” When Mortimer came to the resolution of writing to Batley, he almost smiled with satisfaction at his own ingenuity in devising misery for his wretched friend, — for so he once esteemed him; and, as if no thought of his brain, — no action of his life, might be uninfluenced by the fate which hung over him, he was roused from the reverie into which he had fallen by a gentle tap at the door of his room. The usual "Come in" presented to his view the miscreant Wilkins, who, according to his master's orders, had brought down the papers which lay on Blocksford's table. They consisted of two or three sonnets, and verses, partly original, and partly transcribed from those popular receptacles for nonsense upon stilts, the Albums and Annuals; but, above and beyond all these, was the hastily written note, which we know he had addressed to Mary Mitcham the evening before, when, at the time, he did not anticipate the opportunity of seeing or speaking to her again.

"I have brought the papers, sir," said Wilkins.

"Right," said Mortimer, — "give them to me: there, go, — leave me, leave me! — and do not come again till I ring, or at least till you are going to bed. Bring me fresh lights; I shall stay here till morning: I have much to do."

Wilkins did as he was bid, and Mortimer, anxious not to betray his weakness before the fellow whom he had raised to the state of a confidential councillor, waited till the lights were brought, and the man again gone, before he ventured to read the papers which the crafty villain had laid before him.

The first, the second, the third, were harmless verses, — all of love, but no more; the fourth and last which he looked at was the note, — the note which the reader remembers.

“ It is natural, dearest, that your feelings should be deeply affected at this moment; and I own that nothing but my conviction that this is an opportunity not to be lost, would have induced me to be so peremptory; but, as you have made me the happiest of happy men, a few words may save us much trouble. Whether you stop at ‘ The Star ’ or ‘ The Angel,’ of course I shall know: trust to me for the rest, and fear nothing: I, of course, have plenty of friends in Oxford, and at either house. I believe, knowing your kind and tender heart, that parting from the dear children will give you the severest pang of all;

but you must not let that feeling get the better of those which you own I have inspired. Heaven bless you ! Before this time to-morrow we shall be safe from the persecutions of all spies and enemies. Remember, — twelve !

“ Ever yours,

“ F. B.”

Mortimer shuddered as he read this hateful proof of heartless treachery: his eyes traced and re-traced, as if they were written in blood, the words, “ Remember, — twelve ! ” The thought, — the notion that the consummation of Helen’s ruin and his own disgrace was at that period pending, maddened him ; and, as if to aggravate every feeling, and sharpen every pang which his misery involved, at that moment, — that very moment the clock on the mantelshelf struck the hour of midnight ! — Mortimer started at the sound, clasped his hands on his forehead, and fell backwards in his chair.

Truly, indeed, did Mortimer admit the power of retributive justice. Some fourteen years before this night of misery, he had borne from the arms of a confiding husband the wife whose affections he had won from her lord, — to the very house now desolated by imaginary crime had he brought this treasure of his heart: there had she lived with him, in all the doubtful happiness and feverish anxiety of unhallowed love,—there had she died;—and now came the avenger. What upon this earth is so terrible as the black retrospect of an ill-spent life! What made Mortimer's firm heart ache, and his proud spirit quail before the ills which oppressed him, but the horrid consciousness of what he might have been, and the dreadful recollection of what he had been? The combination, altogether, was tremendous: his former crimes, — his still continued acquaintance with the Countess — the result of that acquaintance — the flight of Helen — her partner in that flight.

All this flashed into his mind, — flashed and burned and raged: his brain was maddened! He started from his seat, and, having fastened the door, proceeded to the table on which lay his pistol-case: he opened it, took out one of the deadly weapons, deliberately loaded it, and then walking towards the glass which was over the fireplace, and looking steadfastly and intently on it, placed the muzzle of the pistol to his throbbing temple. — One instant and all would have been over: a faint sound caught his ear: it was the waking cry of his infant boy. It acted like magic upon the distracted father: the hand that held the pistol fell motionless.

“God is just!” said Mortimer, — “but he is merciful. I hear the cry of my child,—my deserted child: it is a call from Heaven!—humbly, devoutly, gratefully do I respond to it! For my children, abandoned by their mother, will I live—yes—and consent to bear a load of wretchedness about me, and be for ever a mark for the finger of scorn to point at.”

He listened; no further sound was heard:—the poor unconscious babe had sunk to sleep again.

With equal calmness and firmness Mortimer drew the charge of the pistol which had been destined to send him from a transitory world of woe to one of eternal punishment; and replacing it in its case, returned to his chair, and, after a self-communing of some hour or so, commenced with a firm hand the following letter to his father-in-law.

Sadgrove,

One o'clock, A.M., April 11, 18—.

“ You may easily imagine the embarrassment in which the necessity of writing this letter involves me; it is a task of terror, but it must be performed. Helen has left me. I have for a considerable length of time doubted, suspected, and believed her guilty: I have even hinted as much to her; but, with an artfulness which I too late discovered to be her characteristic, she appeared to be unconscious of my meaning. It is all over now. Under the pretext of visiting you in an illness which I have good reason to believe never afflicted you, at least to the extent described, she quitted Sadgrove yesterday at about three o'clock: at dinner-time Mr. Francis Blocksford was absent: he has not returned; and I have before me proofs irrefragable that they met at Oxford, and thence took their departure for some other destination.

“Far be it from me to reproach you for the course and character of the education which you were pleased to give Helen. In the earliest stage of my affection for her, I always felt the danger and difficulty which a man would incur who should try to domesticate so much spirit and pretension, favoured and excited as they had been by your own unlimited indulgence of her, and the absurd flattery of a herd of fops and fools, who think it fine to set up an idol upon a pedestal in society, and worship it, God knows why!

“When you persecuted me back to London, after I had quitted it, disgusted with what I had seen of Helen’s conduct with Lord Ellesmere, whom she jilted, I was weak enough to believe my authority sufficiently strong to render her the means of restoring me to happiness: but no! — the hope was frail, — the delusion brief; and I soon found that the opinions of some very old friends of mine, that I had utterly miscalculated the results of my marriage, were but too well founded.

“ In fact, my life has, for the last three years, been a life of misery, — misery created by an anxiety which I can scarcely describe: she universally betrayed a want of confidence in me; she always appeared estranged from me, — rather afraid of me than loving me with the frankness and cordiality which her apparent ingenuousness had led me to expect. A marked effort to be obedient, and never to thwart my wishes, and a strained desire to be remarkably careful never to do what she thought I should not like, were not the genuine fruits of a real devoted attachment. In fact, she never could forget that I had been devoted to another; and, as I know from unquestionable authority, listened with pleasure to histories of my former indiscretions: nay, to such an extent did she carry this, that very soon after our marriage I found, by accident, in her room, a volume of a book containing the trial between Hillingdon and myself about Amelia, selected out of ten thousand other volumes in my library for her special edification. When I charged her with this needless anxiety to detect my faults, she made some pretext that the Countess St. Alme had sent it her for some other purpose, I forget what. This the Countess, however, positively denied to me; and although I did not condescend to mention the matter again, it has remained registered in my mind ever since.

“You may wonder how what may appear to you a trifle, can occupy me at a moment like this, when she has worked her own destruction and my disgrace; but, as I dare say we shall hereafter find the lady justifying her crime by something like retaliation, I think it important to mention a circumstance so illustrative of the spirit upon which she has uniformly acted, occurring as it did within so short a time after our marriage.

“To you, who must be aware of my early and long intimacy with the Countess St. Alme, the fact that Mr. Francis Bloeksford is the partner of Helen’s flight will perhaps be particularly shocking: that I have sense enough left to write these lines is my only wonder. I thought that Helen, during the last few months, must have known more of this connexion than she previously did, because she made a condition that the Countess should not pay her annual visit here this season ; but now I believe this exclusion to have had its origin only in an apprehension that the Countess might have detected the intrigue which was in progress between her and Francis. If she were to object to an association with the Countess St. Alme on any other score, I have only to observe, that you were perfectly aware of the intimacy which had long subsisted between us, as well as of the delicacy of the Countess's position in society, and that you never objected to her being an inmate in your daughter's house.

“ The line I have determined to adopt will have been taken before this reaches you. By noon of this day, — for it is past midnight while I write, — I shall have quitted Sadgrove with my children, who must be preserved from the contamination which any further intercourse with their wretched mother would involve. I shall write by this post to my solicitors to take such steps as may be considered necessary in the affair, and to provide Helen with the income secured to her either as jointure or by that most extraordinary clause in the settlements, inserted, I believe, at your suggestion, 'in case of separation.' I really do not know which to compliment the more, your instinctive providence as a parent, or your well-matured knowledge of the world as a man, in having made this special condition: in either case it does you infinite credit, and, I promise you, your daughter shall have full benefit of your 'diplomacy.'

"What measures I may subsequently adopt will be matter for future consideration: the initiatory proceedings which I have instituted are simply those of sending forth out of my house everything that can be supposed to belong to the fugitives. As my hand is stayed against taking vengeance upon the partner of her flight by ties of which the world may not be told, — they may be guessed at, — it will be of little consequence to me whether or not I rid myself of a guilty wife by a course of law; the feeling which must spare the life of Francis Blocksford, may extend even to saving him from ruin in a worldly sense of the word. His fortune is small, for his mother's husband was reduced in circumstances before his death.

“As I have already said, as far as money matters are concerned, your unfortunate daughter is, providentially, at her ease, and therefore my care for her future career is at an end. She may rest assured I shall never farther interfere with her: the connexion she has formed may secure her a happiness, upon which I shall never intrude, and a tranquillity, which I have no disposition to disturb. The only point upon which I take my stand is, as regards the children. Within eight-and-forty hours of the moment in which I write this, they will be removed beyond her reach, never to be restored to her sight until they are old enough to shun and revolt from her whom, if her own misconduct had not destroyed the claim, they ought to have loved and obeyed.

“ Mark, this is the last letter that you will ever receive from me. Ten thousand circumstances had estranged you from me previously to this horrid disgrace; your brother, as I have frankly admitted, I never could endure; and the person whom you have thought proper to marry appears to be by no means an unlikely confidante in the scheme, the success of which imperatively separates us for ever.

“ I have left to the servants the immediate removal of everything from Sadgrove belonging to Helen, with directions to send the whole of her personal property to your house, and with it whatever the viper I have cherished in my bosom may have left behind him. I dismiss them both for ever from my mind: — my deepest, bitterest curses, be upon their heads! Mark me, again, in conclusion, — no supplication with regard to the children, no remonstrance, no palliation, no explanation, nothing will avail, — I repeat solemnly and finally, they will never see their unnatural mother until I have taught them to hate and despise her.

“ If I fancied you were an hundredth part so ill as the deceiver painted you, I would not inflict this letter upon you ; but her falsehoods are now laid bare, and I discredit the whole story. If you feel yourself aggrieved, or are wildly romantic enough to espouse your ruined daughter’s cause, a line ‘ forwarded ’ to my solicitors shall afford you the opportunity of vindicating her and exposing yourself at any time you may suggest. Whatever reflections your conduct in the arrangement of our marriage may suggest, I shall not so far shelter myself under my own opinions as to refuse you, even now, the consideration of a gentleman.

“ F. M.”

Mortimer, besides this letter, wrote, as he said he should, to his solicitors, apprizing them of what had occurred, and directing what should be done ; for, be it understood, that men who have extensive connexions and various concerns to conduct, being thrown into different circles, for different purposes invariably use more than one lawyer. In the management of his affairs, properly so to be called, Mortimer naturally consulted his solicitors, who were men of character, of honour, and of reputation; but in the jugglery of usurious money-raising, compromising dirty actions, and all such business, one of the grubbers of the profession was retained: hence his association with Mr. Brimmer Brassey. Quick, ready, and indefatigable, there was scarcely any capacity in which Mr. Brassey would not act to oblige an aristocratic client; but as to confiding to him the conduct of a case like this which had now burst upon him, Mortimer would as soon have cut off his right hand as permitted their names to be associated in the public papers, through which, as it seemed most probable, the whole of the particulars must eventually be given to the world.

But now, could it be believed, except that we know it is true, that Mortimer, — mad, —absolutely mad, as we have already seen, — on the verge of suicide, and reckless, in every sense of the word, of all that might happen, should be able to sit down and write a letter of studied insult to his father-in-law, wherein—(but see how that marks his character)—he could rake up the smallest circumstances that had occurred years before, and been treasured in his mind, to justify his earlier suspicion of his wife, who, at the moment he was writing this very letter, was on her knees praying for his happiness and that of her beloved children, before she sank into a deep and sweet sleep, induced by the journey and excitement and exertion, which, fortunately, — at least it might have been fortunately, — so overcame her bodily strength as to give her repose during a night through which, if it had not so happened, her anxiety for her suffering parent would have kept her awake.

Mortimer read over what he had written, and felt a savage pleasure in marking and pointing every line and word which he knew was best calculated to inflict pain upon his unhappy father-in-law; and when he folded the letter, there was a sort of triumphant satisfaction in his manner of concluding his elaborated cruelty which was highly characteristic of the man: nay, so far did he carry his solicitude to mark the firmness of his resolution, even in the midst of the tempest of his feelings, that he took the trouble to hunt out from a long-neglected drawer a seal upon which his arms alone were engraved, — the Mortimer bearings without the alloy of the Batleys: — so much method was there in his madness.

Having achieved this measure, of the atrocity of which, to be sure, he was not conscious, Mortimer proceeded to write to his solicitors, to his bankers, and, in fact, to everybody who was in any degree professionally interested in the great move he was about to make, and so he remained until nearly four o'clock in the morning, when, worn out with fatigue of mind and body, he threw himself upon a sofa, and fell into a restless slumber for two or three hours.

It is not permitted us at this moment to know what had been passing at Oxford during the same period — that will be developed hereafter ; but it is permitted us to hate and loath the wretch who could have saved all the misery which we see in progress, and who, while his wretched master was agonized and tortured even to the point of suicide, was sleeping soundly and dreaming of future prosperity.

CHAPTER V.

It may easily be imagined that Mortimer's slumbers were neither sound nor refreshing. That nature was so far exhausted as to sink under the excitement which had acted upon him, and that he actually did sleep for two or three hours, there can be no doubt : — but what a sleep ! — and where ! We must not indulge in thoughts and reflections ; we shall have enough to do within the short space allowed us, to record events.

As Wilkins was the last person closetted with his master at night, so was he the first called into council in the morning ; and the first subject upon which the master proposed to consult him was, the method of getting rid of his visitors without exciting a suspicion of the real cause of their sudden dispersion, or letting them know his determination to quit Sadgrove in the course of the day. This trouble he need not have taken, for upon a mere hint of his difficulty and anxiety upon the point, his prime minister informed him that all the carriages, except that of Colonel Magnus, were ordered to be at the door immediately after breakfast, and that two sets of post-horses had already arrived from Worcester, having been sent for as early as six o'clock.

“But how is this?” said Mortimer: “Lady Mary did not mean to go for two or three days; — no more did Harvie, — nor Lord Harry.”

“No, sir,” said Wilkins, “but, of course, after what has happened, they naturally think their presence would not be very desirable; besides, they could not stay after you were gone, and” —

“Gone!” exclaimed Mortimer, — “‘after what has happened’ — what do you mean? They know nothing of what has happened; — they cannot understand what I propose to do.”

it to Lord Harry,
as they were both going, it was tho Harvie into the s were to be ordered then, after Lady I dressed her, and s it; and so after su of in my room, I course, could not it."

"Then I am pr
"I thought I cou with any secret, be

"Ah! sir," said
ing upon anybody
nel. to be enve m

“That being the case,” said Mortimer, “I will see none of them: it will save us all a world of painful effort. Say that I am too ill to leave my room. Tell Colonel Magnus to come to me as soon as they are all gone. Desire the nurse to bring the children to me here: I will not run the risk of encountering any of them in my way along the lobby to the nursery: let me see the children directly;—and take care that I have four horses here at two o’clock. When the Colonel leaves me, bring me some breakfast here, and then let me see your books, and I will settle the current accounts, leaving you a sufficient sum to pay the Worcester bills and bills here.”

“This, sir,” said Wilkins, endeavouring to hide his exultation under an expression of sorrow which he contrived to throw into his countenance, “is a sad and heavy day!—more hearts than yours, sir, will ache at this break-up.”

“I knew too well how surely it must happen,” said Mortimer, “but the blow has fallen, and talking will not relieve me from its weight ; so do all that I have told you, and let it be understood that I do not join my friends at breakfast." — " Gracious Heaven !" added he, " what revolutions may be effected in one short day ! This time yesterday, Helen, the admired, courted, and flattered mistress of Sadgrove, was surrounded by companions each vying with the other to do her honour ; and now — I must not think of this : I have much to do that must and shall be done on the instant. My heart might, even now, relent, if I hesitated in action. The children must be saved, and, to save them, they must be instantly placed beyond her reach, — ay, even beyond her knowledge of their destination."

" Why, sir," said Wilkins, " it is a hard thing to do, but if you feel it right to take such a step, why, as I say, the sooner it is done "——

" Aye, and the more decidedly it is done," interrupted his master, " the better. When they are safe, I shall return to await the call of my father-in-law, if my letter should have roused his anger. As for the wretched cause of my misery, he "——

"Ah! sir," said Wilkins, "there it is. Of course you couldn't think of raising your hand against him!"

"Why, sir?" said Mortimer, doubting the evidence of his senses when he heard these words.

"Oh! sir," said Wilkins, apparently alarmed at his master's sudden excitement, "I don't know, sir."

"You do know, sir!" said Mortimer, — "and how do you know it?"

"I beg a thousand pardons, sir!" said Wilkins. "I ought not to have said what I did."

"Said!" exclaimed Mortimer, "you may say what you please, — you have said nothing: — but what do you mean? Why should I not raise my arm against Francis Blocksford as I would raise it against any other violater of my honour?"

"Why," said Wilkins, doubtful whether he should at once proclaim his perfect knowledge of the whole truth, — “ he is your godson, sir, — named after you ; — and — his mother, sir ”——

“ Well, sir, what of that ? ” said Mortimer. “ You mean more than you say. What have you heard ?—what do you know ? Why speak of the Countess St. Alme ?—what has she to do with her son’s criminality ? ”

“ No, sir,” said Wilkins ; “ but considering how intimate you have been for so many years, and ” ——

“ That ’s not the point,” said Mortimer. “ Tell me, this instant, what your knowledge, — what your suspicions are, to induce you to believe that there exists some tie between the destroyer of my happiness and myself, which holds my hand from taking just revenge upon his villainy ! ”

“ I wish I had not said a word upon the subject,” said Wilkins.

“ But you have said a word upon the subject,” cried his master, “ and more words you must say upon the subject before I part with you. You know I implicitly trust you, — I rely upon you: in return for this confidence, have I not a right to demand an explanation of an expression which conveys so much?"

"It was foolish of me to let the word drop," said Wilkins, whose affected unwillingness to let his master know how perfectly his secrets were in his keeping, produced exactly the effect upon his victim which he intended it should produce, — "but what I meant, sir, was, — and you will not be angry, — it is not my nature to deceive, — and I spoke without thinking, — I did hear, some twelve or fourteen months since, that Mrs. Woodgate said openly that Mr. Francis was more likely the son than the godson of her master."

"What! — Woodgate, Helen's former maid?" said Mortimer.

"The same, sir," said Wilkins, "and I believe she knew more about it than she chose to say."

"This makes matters worse than all," said Mortimer. "If Woodgate knew it, Helen knows it, — at least," checking himself, "whatever there is to know."

“ I believe, sir,” said Wilkins, “ that Mrs. Woodgate did not stick at trifles to find out anything she wanted to get hold of ; she didn’t care what she did in that way. In fact, I have caught her listening, with her ear to the keyholes of rooms in which parties have been conversing, — ay, fifty times, sir.”

“ Infernal treachery !” exclaimed Mortimer.

“ Horrid duplicity !” murmured the man.

“ Why did you not tell me of this at the time ?” said Mortimer.

“ I did not like to intrude, sir,” replied Wilkins. “ I always fancy that a master to whom one servant informs against another, may fancy it is done to get unfairly into his good graces.”

“ Ridiculous !” said Mortimer. “ And so, then, it is generally thought here that Mr. Francis Blocksford and I are, in point of fact, more nearly related than our different names would lead the world to suspect.”

“ No, sir,” said Wilkins, “ not generally. Miss Nettleship, Lady Bembridge’s young lady, said that her lady was never comfortable where the Countess St. Alme was; and that she thought it a pity she was so much here; and that she remembered something, and that sort of thing; and Miss Nettleship said she could not make out what her lady meant, because she never spoke straight out; but when she had done talking about it, she laughed, and said she really thought Mr. Francis Blocksford very like you, which, as she added, considering your Christian names were the same, was odd enough."

How much farther this dialogue might have been carried, it is impossible to say: it was one of deep interest to Mortimer, inasmuch as what had transpired in the course of it convinced him that Helen herself had been enlightened upon the point of Frank's connexion with him, and that her knowledge, or even suspicion, of such a fact, increased her criminality in a tenfold degree. A tap at the door, however, terminated it: it was Colonel Magnus who solicited admission.

This unexpected arrival induced Mortimer to change the order of his arrangements, and desire Wilkins to send the children when he next rang his bell.

The dialogue which ensued between the friends it is not worth while to record; its character and details may easily be imagined. Magnus did not attempt to dissuade him from his resolution of not again seeing his guests; and when reproached with having let slip the secret which he had promised to keep, he soothed and satisfied Mortimer by a justification of his conduct founded on the belief that it would be much better, — as he himself admitted, — that the party should break up without any further discussion of the subject, which would have been impossible if an attempt to conceal the truth had been made, inasmuch as during breakfast and the morning the conversation would naturally have turned upon Mrs. Mortimer's journey and the absence of Blocksford; and, after all, there must have been some explanation of the reason for Mortimer's dismissing his guests so suddenly, and quitting his house so abruptly: — “And so,” said the Colonel, “eventual publicity being inevitable, I considered it by far the best way to let so much of the truth be understood last night as would relieve you from the necessity of telling the whole of it this morning."

To the man earnestly anxious to get rid of his visitors, and to put into execution a decisive scheme of cutting at once the ties which held him to Sadgrove, a much less plausible explanation than that of the Colonel would have been perfectly satisfactory ; Magnus, therefore, was commissioned to do the honours, and convey the best wishes of Mortimer to his friends, who were exceedingly well pleased with the arrangement, seeing, as Lady Mary Sanderstead observed, " that nothing is so unpleasant as melancholy stories ; and as to condolence, it is the greatest possible bore to both parties : and on such occasions as the present, it was so difficult to know what to say, and the poor man would, of course, be so wretched : and then they had known Helen so intimately, — and it was altogether so exceedingly shocking !" — having said all which, Lord Harry Martingale handed her to her carriage ; and finding that by some mistake neither his carriage nor the horses which he had desired his servant to order had arrived, her ladyship was good enough to offer him a seat in her britscha as far as Worcester, if he was not afraid to venture, and if Colonel Magnus would not be censorious.

Thus flirting, thus giggling, and thus chattering, the dear friend of the Mrs. Mortimer of yesterday, left her desolated home for ever, not having thought it necessary even to take one last look at the innocent babes whom she had left behind her.

When they had all departed, Magnus returned to his friend, who then left his room, and visited again, and, as he felt, for the last time, the drawing-room, the favourite boudoir of his wife, and all that suite which she had so lately cheered and ornamented by her presence. The song she had last sung still rested on the desk ; the flowers she had last gathered still bloomed where she had placed them ; and as Mortimer gazed on them in the dead stillness of his deserted house, big tears rolled down his cheeks. All her grace and beauty, and all her kindness to him during his long and painful illness, seemed set in array before him. He thought of her as if she were dead: his conscience accused him of a thousand faults — a thousand weaknesses—for his heart was melted; and if his friend at that moment had made the effort, the probability is, that at all events his departure would have been at least delayed, and all might yet have been well. But no: — the friend was anxious that he should go; and when he saw how powerfully the recollection of his lost Helen affected the wretched husband, he led him from the scene which so excited him, and begged him to bear up against a misfortune which was now inevitable, and make those arrangements which a regard for his own honour, and justice to his children, peremptorily demanded that he should forthwith conclude.

The clock had not struck three when Mortimer, with his two children and their nurse within the carriage, and his valet in the rumble, bade adieu to Sadgrove, having arranged all his domestic affairs, and installed Wilkins troil over the who the unlimited, an guarded, terms in dered him absolute

the power of dismi ordinate members he thought proper verbal instructions
the smallest necess peared delighted at cipal's retirement, ( as it permitted hi unencumbered flig where his genius a appreciated than in
of a gloomy temper
salad par preference

out of his power to make up the cellar-books before Mr. Mortimer's departure, and therefore his vouchers were necessarily to be rendered to Mr. Wilkins: this took, as appeared in the sequel, two or three days properly to arrange, during which period it was observed that a most extraordinary number of empty bottles left the Hall in divers and sundry carts for Worcester.

That Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Tapley were d'accord, nobody can doubt: they both agreed in rejoicing at the incalculable advantages of such an occurrence as that which had taken place in the family, and in possessing a master who, however democratic his taste might be as to the cuisine, had a soul far above the paltry consideration of his cellar.

The reader need not be informed that the unfortunate family of the Crawleys were speedily ejected from their tenement, as the consequence of their father's removal from his stewardship,—a measure which Mr. Wilkins represented as being the result of an imperative order from Mr. Mortimer. Ten days were allowed the unfortunate old man to render his accounts and make his retreat ; which having been effected, Mr. Wilkins set the workmen belonging to Messrs. Dabbs, Splash, and Wypum, the painters and paper-hangers at Worcester, to fit up in the nicest possible manner the very agreeable house which the ejected steward had for many years occupied, previously to paying their bill for work done at Sadgrove, in which his little " commission " was to be, of course, included.

Such being the state of affairs at head quarters, we may perhaps be permitted to take a glance at what has been doing elsewhere.

In the outset, it may be as well to inform the reader that Mr. Jacob Batley, having realized as much money as he considered essential to his own comfort, had retired from business and taken a box at Walworth, where he ruralized during the morning, but whence, in order to prevent the possibility of being forced into anything like hospitality, he regularly proceeded to town in a low four-wheeled carriage, built to hold only " one inside," and drawn by one horse, in which he diurnally journeyed to "The Horn," where he regularly dined, varying his habits only inasmuch as that on Sundays he favoured his brother Jack with his company.

In order to place himself completely à l'abri, and entirely out of reach of the effects of mercantile speculation, he had disposed of his business, and invested in the Funds the nett profits which he had realized. He thought that if he bought land, it would entail upon him innumerable cares and embarrassments; bad tenants, appeals to his consideration, legal involvements, and a thousand other inconveniences. By his present arrangement, he had nothing to do but to receive his dividends, and as they amounted to a sum vastly exceeding his annual expenditure, Mr. Brimmer Brassey, who managed all his matters, was directed to continue investing the overplus, although no power on earth could induce old Batley to make a will. In fact, his horror at the mere suggestion of "giving or bequeathing" anything that was his own was such, that his legal adviser felt his tenure of office dependent mainly upon his evitation of that extremely disagreeable subject.

During John Batley's illness, Jacob had called but once, and that was on the Sunday preceding Helen's visit to London ; and, upon that occasion, having come to dine, and being told that his brother was worse than he had been, and was in bed, he asked the servant whether his master would be able to go down to dinner. The man shook his head, and, with a countenance expressive of a melancholy anticipation that he would never go down to dinner again, replied in the negative. Jacob answered the announcement with a grunt, and then, in a tone of vexation caused rather by the disappointment of his expectations as to his hebdomadal dinner, than by anything like fraternal solicitude, he let down the front-glass of his "sulky," and, addressing his coach-boy on the box, said,

"Well then, Thomas, I suppose you must just go back to 'The Horn.' I have no pity for such people. I never was ill in my life. Psha ! — there, go on."

As regards Helen's progress from Sadgrove to Oxford, her resting there, and the events which occurred during her stay, the reader is already pretty well prepared for the results. True to her faith to Francis, Miss Mitcham, throughout the journey, never permitted herself to be betrayed into an expression calculated to awaken her kind and considerate mistress's suspicions of the step so shortly to be taken by her and her devoted, — infatuated lover: and actuated by the same spirit of affection for him and submission to his will, she contrived, after having seen Helen safely deposited in bed for the night, to conduct her part of the enterprise with so much skill and dexterity, that it was not until nine o'clock on the following morning, and after Mrs. Mortimer had rung thrice, that the diffident fair one was returned "absent without leave." Upon a "reference" to her room, it appeared that her bed had not been slept in; but upon the table was left an open note, containing these words :

“When Mrs. Mortimer enquires for me in the morning, tell her that my flight is voluntary, and that I am safe and happy: all I regret is, the inconvenience my sudden departure may occasion her. I still live in hopes of forgiveness.

“M. M.”

Helen, who was really and truly interested in Mary's fate, was entirely relieved from the anxiety she felt on the first announcement of the young lady's elopement. In her present state of solicitude about her father's health, the trifling discomfort arising from her maid's defection gave her little or no uneasiness; one of the chambermaids of the inn officiated quite satisfactorily: and when Helen sat down to her hurried and tasteless breakfast, the footman who was in attendance on her was questioned as to any knowledge of the circumstances connected with Mitcham's unexpected departure; but he denied all cognizance of her mental motives or personal movements, and Helen contented herself by writing a hasty note to Mortimer, informing him of the circumstance, and of the progress she had herself made on her way to town.

Having finished these matters, Mrs. Mortimer again pursued her journey towards London, and reached Grosvenor Street at about four o'clock in the afternoon.

When Mortimer quitted Sadgrove, in order effectually to shut out anything in the shape of appeal or explanation from his wife or her father, he left directions with Wilkins to transmit whatever letters might arrive to his address, to his solicitors in London, who had received his instructions to keep them until they should hear further from him; nor was even Wilkins trusted with the knowledge of his master's destination, his secrecy upon that point being induced by the anxiety that the unfortunate Helen should obtain no clue to the place to which her children were to be removed beyond her reach: all that was known to anybody was, that the horses were ordered to Tewksbury. In consequence of these precautionary arrangements, Mortimer did not receive the following answer from his wife until many days after its date.

Grosvenor Street, April 12, 18—.

“ The vile, atrocious letter which you addressed to my father, and which was received this morning, came too late, — he was dead before it arrived : — and if anything can alleviate the grief which I feel for the loss of the kindest and best of parents, it is the blessed reflection that even in death he escaped the savage insults with which you had proposed to assail him, and a knowledge of the infamous falsehoods with which you have dared to calumniate me.

“ I write this at his bed-side : my eyes are fixed upon his calm, placid countenance. The hand which would have avenged his injured child is clasped in mine ; and I thank God that he was taken from me while yet unconscious of the degradation to which I have been subjected, or the fate to which I am doomed.

“ What a heart must that be, — which I once believed I had gained, — in which could rankle, year after year, feelings such as those which your letter avows, and which could lead you to address such a letter to the father of a devoted wife, while stretched on the bed of sickness and of death !

“ If I could humble my proud spirit to answer the odious allegations which that letter contains, I would ask you what grounds I have ever afforded for your suspicions of my honour, or your belief in my duplicity and deception ? — I would enquire upon what actions of mine was founded your opinion that the much-censured openness of my mind, and consequent freedom of expression, was assumed ; or why you should imagine that a feeling of jealousy, founded upon a long-past attachment of yours to another, — the quiet of whose neglected grave I envy, — should have damped my affection for you, or have estranged me from the only man on earth I ever loved, and whose happiness it was my object, as it would have been my pride, to secure, or rather restore, regardless of all the bitter insinuations of the perfidious woman with whom you your baseness, by doing which creature you sit upon your head man and honor your rage, that your early crime and the constant

“To that we —are attributal have entailed u cited the belief
ing alive the me
the last of your less to endeavor
your confidence;
errors, the visit

wished to touch upon, my councillor and adviser was the Countess St. Alme.

“ You reproach my dead father with not objecting to that person’s constant residence in our house. My father, knowing the world so well as he did, and therefore, perhaps, not judging too favourably of its ways, could not have conceived the possibility of such conduct as yours has been to me: on the contrary, having entrusted me and my honour to your charge, the very fact that the person in question was selected by you as a companion for me, decided at once any doubts which might have floated in his mind, and convinced him that the rumours he had heard injurious to her character were unfounded.

“ But why do I go on? — why do I condescend to argue or explain? Why should I declare my entire ignorance of Mr. Blocksford’s destination, or why should I even write his name, considering who he really is, and why the secret of his origin has been divulged? I even doubt the truth of the asser-

who possesses and wicked hi whose only de of rectitude wa him.

“ I tell you,
here before me would have an
it. Your offer despise and reje to burn the se documents exis any claim upo debased and d were what you me, if I accept all I ask is, in have done me,
ed upon me. t

I will accept it even gratefully, —is the restoration of my children to my arms.

“ Mortimer, I am innocent ! — God knows the truth, and the world will know it too ! Whatever may be the fate of Francis Blockford, — whatever his objects, his intentions, his destination, they are all alike unknown to me. A few days must clear up the mystery of his disappearance, and establish my fame and reputation clear and unsullied ; there can, therefore, be no reason why my children, whom I love better than my life, should be kept from me. But mark, the concession must involve no condition on my part as to a reconciliation with their father : — no, Mortimer, — once-loved Mortimer, the die is cast ! If your letter had contained simply the outpourings of a heart deeply affected, and the effusions of a mind highly excited by designing persons, and filled with the belief of my criminality, which the lapse of a few hours would have disproved, I might, devoted as I have been to you, have made myself believe that in your breast, truths have been tion must be e

ask for my child of them as an have suffered,—
I have laboured,
I have been so to which I have my children, an the ills the world they shall be alv ever you desire to me for teaching may be reciprocal upon it, Mortals your faults from me; but ask yourself, even as a matter of policy, whether it would not be wise to confide them to me, at least till they arrive at a certain age. I could not condescend to ask a favour where I claim a right, but that the ties of Nature are not to be broken—a mother's love is not to be quenched; and if my claim is denied,—on my knees, even to the destroyer of my happiness, will I beg for my children.

“The struggle is over, and my proud spirit has yielded; even now, I beseech you to let me have them:—upon all other points I am firm, and repeat the words which are registered in my heart—OUR SEPARATION IS ETERNAL!

“Why this decision, on my part, is irrevocable, I need hardly explain: it is not founded alone or entirely upon your groundless repudiation of a fond and faithful wife, which in itself, taken with your reasonings on the subject, would be sufficient to justify it—but I have made it, because no reconciliation, even were I for the sake of my children to submit to it, could be permanent after an avowal again, was seen

"It may be here with my serves the same made to her i funeral of my shall expect y request, if you my letter of y unconsciousness disposition to with the sudd from Oxford, I which appears highest degree incident in my

"I cannot c not be

tice with which you have requited my affection, and that you may be made sensible in time for a due repentance of those crimes, the memory of which has destroyed the best attributes of your nature, and irrevocably sealed the misery of your wretched

“ HELEN.

“ I despatch this to Sadgrove, whence, I presume, should you really have left it, your letters will be forwarded.”

The reader will see, that as Mortimer quitted Sadgrove on the afternoon of the 11th, having despatched his letter to Batley so as to go by that afternoon's post to London, his wife's first letter of the same day, despatched from London to Sadgrove, giving a detailed account of Miss Mitcham's disappearance, did not reach Sadgrove till the forenoon of the 12th; so that their letters crossed each other on the road; and Mrs. Mortimer, agitated and overwhelmed by her anxiety about her father, which rendered the defection of her maid a matter of almost indifference at the moment, not having undergone the hands of Mr and peeped in riosity, were, an admirable ser to his master's

With regard between poor the barbarity Batley, at Heck of the insult contained, during the hey-day of eyes were turned all lips were either fine or as vulgar. or a l spair and desolation, was all to Helen ; and her devoted and unaffected sorrow for the loss of poor Batley seemed to unite the two in bonds not only of friendship but affection.

In the midst of all the misery with which they were overwhelmed, Mr. Jacob Batley, who had not been present at his brother's death, nor, indeed, paid the slightest attention to him during his illness, as we have already seen, arrived in Grosvenor Street. He was, of course, admitted, and Mrs. Batley saw him. Of Helen's arrival he probably knew nothing, and certainly cared no more.

“ Well,” said Jacob, “ so it's all over : — poor Jack ! I suppose you have killed him with kindness. Well, there's no use in grieving for what can't be recalled. Have you looked for a will ? I dare say he never made one : died intestate, most likely ; — so much the better for next of kin.”

“ My dear sir,” said Mrs. Batley, “ I have never given a thought to anything of the kind. The few short hours that have passed since my dear husband's death have been devoted won't settle a bury a dead mean to empla

The widow to answer, — question.

“Why, de nothing new how nicely we What I was t have the sam
time as did th
fifty per cent.
town than at t
as I was comin both trouble a put in the sam

underneath, when your time comes, unless, in due time, you should like to take a third."

"Dear, Mr. Batley," said Teresa, "how you talk! I am sure I shall be too grateful to you to relieve me from the details of the sad duties to be performed. I am not aware that he expressed any particular wish as to the place of interment"—and here she burst into tears; "and I"—

"Well then,—there, that'll do," said Jacob; "I'll manage it all. But you had better hunt about for his will, or send down to his lawyers,—it may be there; because he may have had some fancy as to where he should like to be buried; and it's always as well to know how a man has disposed of his property before another man engages himself in troublesome business on his account."

Jacob had, unconsciously, hit the point. The moment Teresa was made to think it possible that if there were a will it might contain some request or instruction relative to his funeral, she acceded to his worldly suggestions, and despatched a note requesting the

After Helen write her let a state of un-the chamber o overcome by which she had or three days lasted nearly awoke calm an

As it turne was a will, an tion of a few to his wife: t tions as to t arrangements of his eccentric

In the mid

immediately on her arrival in town, acquainting her with her flight, and her total inability to account for it by any circumstances that had occurred during the journey, or at their separation for the night. The morning after the death of poor Batley, Helen, however, received a hurried note from the unconscious cause of all the mischief which was in progress.

Newark, April 12, 18—.

“DEAR MRS. MORTIMER,

“You must forgive me: the anger of my poor dear mother, and the vengeance of my father-in-law, I care little for, in comparison with the fear I feel of having put you to some inconvenience. Secure now from all pursuit, I halt for five minutes to apprise you of Mary Mitcham’s perfect safety: by to-morrow night she will have ceased to bear that name. I have written to her mother by this post. I never shall repent of the step I have taken; she is as good as she is lovely. I have written to Mr. Mortimer three times, and also to Wilkins, to desire him to send from the N regards, and having so at alternative.

6

A double unhappy Hele
cis had justifi
an elopement, the companion
Helen could Francis shoul step, and almo
ing permitted
Mary's praise.

relative position as regarded Mortimer: that knowledge had, almost unconsciously, changed the character of her feelings towards him, and invested him with an interest, the nature of which she could scarcely characterize, but which, if severely tested and thoroughly analyzed, would, more than anything in the world, have proved the nobleness of her generosity, and the intensity of her devotion to her husband.

It would pain—perhaps tire—the reader, to touch more than lightly upon the progress of the preparations for the mournful ceremony which eventually awaits us all, and which were, as we know, placed under the direction of uncle Jacob; but there are certain circumstances connected with the events of the week, to which we must refer.

On the Thursday arrived, without note or notice, trunks, boxes, &c. addressed — “ To Mrs. Mortimer :—to be left at J. Batley’s, Esq. Grosvenor Street,”—containing all her wearing apparel, jewels, trinkets, &c., — and all Mr. Francis Blocksford’s “ moveables,” guitar painting-boxes, &c. included, which, coming without one word of communication from anybody, seemed to decide her fate. The supposed community of interest between Francis and herself, so forcibly implied by her husband's directions, struck the wretched Helen to the heart. She could have loved Francis Blocksford more now than she had ever fancied she might have dared to love him, and have felt the deepest interest in his welfare; and this, — even this, would she have felt for Mortimer's sake. But no : — her fate was sealed — her destiny decreed !

In the course of Jacob's diurnal visits to Grosvenor Street, he had never expressed the slightest desire to take a last look at his brother's remains ; on the contrary, he positively declined the offer, almost pressed upon him, to visit them. He discussed with perfect philosophy the goodness of the lead, the soundness of the wood, the fineness of the cloth, and the excellence of the nails, of which the coffins were composed, — for those he had seen, — but he could not bear the sight of death. He did not like to think of dying: money would be of no use after death; and even if it would, he must leave his, behind him:—and why should he look at a corpse?—he couldn't bring it to life!—could it do any good?—no—and he would rather not.

Nevertheless, there he was, every day, and there he dined every day.

“Helen,” said he, “I don't see why I shouldn't pick a bit. You eat nothing,—no, nor even Teresa,—neither of you: I suppose grief spoils the appetite. I never grieve;—I can always eat. Now, they always serve dinner here every day just as usual; it is quite as well I should have my bit here, as that it should be wasted, and I go and pay for my feed at ‘The Horn:’”—and, accordingly, he did “pick his bit,” and drink his wine; and as neither of the ladies were very communicative, or desired to make a confidence with him, he remained four days in blissful ignorance of what had occurred at Sadgrove, and endeavoured to impress upon Helen's mind his readiness to be reconciled to Mortimer by drinking his health in a bumper, before the disconsolate sufferers sought refuge from his coarseness in flight.

But with all this, and fifty other oppressive inflictions from the same quarter, the poor mourners were compelled to bear, — indeed, more, — for, under the circumstances in which they were placed, they were necessitated to rely upon this uncouth creature for advice and direction in all the arrangements which were to take place: in the midst of which embarrassments and difficulties came to Helen the letter from Mortimer's solicitors of which we have heard before, touching the income to be allowed her according to her jointure, during her separation from her husband, in which they assured her, by his direction, that he had no intention to proceed legally in the case, (nor could he have done so under any circumstances, considering what had happened to himself,) and that therefore she might draw on them for the amount of her settled income quarterly.

Proud in the perfect consciousness of innocence, — broken down by sorrow for the loss of her beloved parent, — mad with disappointment at the failure of all her hopes of happiness with her tyrant, and resolved to let the world judge between them when the fit season should arrive, — conceive what her feelings were, when uncle Jacob presented himself, just at the dinner-hour, in a state of grief such as she had never suspected him capable of expressing, or even, indeed, of feeling.

“ Dear Mr. Batley,” said Mrs. John Batley, “ what has happened to excite you in this extraordinary manner ?”

“ Oh !” said Batley, “ he is gone, — gone, — and I never shall see him more !”

And he burst into something like a flood of tears.

“ Nay, dear uncle,” said Helen, distressed to see the old man so agitated, “ it is our duty to endeavour to reconcile ourselves to losses like these. Heaven knows how I suffer ; but we are told to hope.”

“ Hope !” said Jacob, “ what hope have I ? — none ! He will never, never come back, Helen !”

“No,” said Teresa, “but perhaps we may go to him!”

“I’ve thought of that myself,” said Jacob; “but I doubt the possibility: no chance of our meeting!”

“Why, dear uncle?” said the subdued niece.

“The world he is gone to, is a wide one,” said old Batley; “but if I thought I could see him once again, I should be very ready to follow him this very night.”

“My dear Mr. Batley,” said Mrs. John, “what has caused this sudden desperation? It is something new to see you so very much excited.”

“New!” said Jacob; “to be sure: I have lost my all, — everything on earth I cared for! — I have” —

“Oh! calm yourself,” said Helen. “I certainly am little calculated to offer advice or comfort, — but do reflect. The laws of Providence are just.”

“Ay, ay,” said Batley, “I dare say they may be: — but what are the laws of New York? Providence and New York are two different places ; there can be no doubt he is gone to the latter."

The ladies looked at each other, and made up their minds that Jacob's grief had turned his brain.

"Where, uncle?" said Helen.

"Oh!" said Jacob, "I can't tell where; but he's gone, that's all we know; and if I could but find out, I would be after him in the first ship that starts"——

"Of whom are you talking?" said Mrs. John Batley.

"Why, what should I be talking of?" exclaimed Jacob. "You all know, I suppose, — all are aware of the heavy, the ruinous loss I have sustained?"

"Too well, uncle!" said Helen, bursting into tears.

"Well then, if you are," said Jacob, "why ask about it? I have been everywhere in the City to-day, to discover where he is gone to — but no, — not a trace!"

"Of whom, uncle?" said Helen.

"Of the scoundrel who has given me the slip," said Jacob, — " Mr. Brimmer Brassey, my infernal attorney, who has taken French leave, having carried off with him, or otherwise disposed of, all my funded property, having, for some time past, been kind enough to permit me the use and accommodation of a certain portion of my dividends."

The poor mourners, although released from the surprise which Jacob's previous conversation had excited, were by no means pleased with the truth, which, at least as far as Mrs. John Batley was implicated, appeared likely to throw her into something like a difficulty.

" What did you think I was talking of?" said Jacob, seeing that his announcement of the real fact had astonished his companions, — " of Jack?—ha, ha! — not I—he is settled, —provided for: no use going to look after him! — but as I am still here, and mean to stay here as long as I can, it is something to me to look after the fellow who, as it at present appears, has swindled me out of all my property. If the smash is what it looks like, I must come and live with you, Teresa, for your seven hundred and fifty per annum is snug."

Involving, even as it did, Mr. Jacob Batley's ruin, this disclosure, and the mode in which it was made, — the tone of conversation which the narrator adopted, coupled with the perfect knowledge which both his hearers had of his unqualified and unmitigated selfishness, rendered the denouément almost entirely uninteresting. It seemed to them as if meanness and selfishness had met their due reward; and the only part of the history which excited either of the auditors, was that which involved the possibility of his future perpetual domestication with the widow.

True it was, however, that Mr. Brimmer Brassey, after having, by dint of wriggling and shirking and sneaking, in every possible way, contrived to secure Jacob's confidence, and by having obtained for him high and usurious interest for loans and mortgages, and charged low costs for the legal arrangements necessary to their illegal settlement, become master of all his available funds, and having lost largely try, his volun

to be, as Jac had been muc become a matt bability the fe have been hon

The astonish of the real son ladies was, at which the mani vously excited, excess of frater assured, that a Brimmer Brasm realized by his out that her ap timer's ~~reputation~~

the following Saturday ; and although Jacob was as little moved by the event as if a dog had died, he attended upon the occasion, and, with the physician, occupied one mourning-coach of two,—the other, containing three equivocal personages somehow connected with the family ; and the remains of the once aspiring, gifted member of society were thus conveyed to what his brother thought proper to call the “ family vault ” at Islington, where they were deposited, side by side, with those of his predecessor in Teresa’s affections.

The procession moved from Grosvenor Street at one, by Jacob’s especial direction, in order that when the ceremony had terminated, and his brother’s body had been laid in its last resting-place, the mourning-coach might set him down at “ The Horn ” tavern in time for his dinner, as near four o’clock as possible.

LEAVE w
the progres having stul any comm her friends tershire to nounced to ceeding fort

Here a d not quite p ceedingly fo of her mast than she at not to budoe

could induce her to do it. Her own brother had been murdered by the blacks at Bongowbang, and she could not venture abroad on any consideration whatever, especially amongst the French, where, besides the cruelties of the Negroes, they lived upon frogs and toads ; not to speak of the dangers of the sea. It was all in vain that Mortimer endeavoured to enlighten her upon the subject ;—she was resolved—go she would not.

Now the wolf who was so exceedingly kind to the Messrs. R. in other days, was not better calculated to travel in a britscha with two “ babbies,” as Mr. Swing called them, than our hero. A nurse, or some female attendant who might take that brevet rank, was absolutely essential. Fortunately, all men’s minds are not alike—or women’s either ; and it did so happen that a remarkably nice, ladylike-looking person, was actually at that moment waiting for the Havre packet, who was on her way to an English family resident at Tours, in order to undertake the management of the nursery. Mortimer’s valet, who knew the world, very soon induced the nice, ladylike looking person, to take charge of the children on the journey, by which undertaking she secured herself, besides the gratuity which Mortimer would naturally afford her, the agrément of travelling by easy stages in a remarkably comfortable English carriage, and in the society — if she had but known it — of one of the most accomplished and dangerous men, in every sense of the word, that ever existed.

When they departed, the poor old anti-gallican, who believed in her heart that the “babbies” would be eaten by the natives, even in preference to the frogs, stood on the pier and saw them go, — in no small degree resembling the hen watching the ducklings, which with patient assiduity she has hatched, taking to the water: she wept, poor soul! and her heart ached even at her own timidity, which hindered her from partaking of their peril.

The reader may perhaps already guess the point to which Mortimer was hurrying. Mr. Farnham, the sister of whom he stood in such awe, and whom he did not love, was, as we have already heard, living at Beaugency : this nurse was going to Tours ; nothing could be easier or more convenient than that she should “ tend the children ” until they were deposited at their aunt’s, and then be forwarded to the place of her ultimate destination : — in fact, it was all in the way, and the event was one of those lucky coincidences which sometimes happen even in the “ worst regulated families.”

Yes, the children were to be consigned to Mrs. Farnham. Her rigid morality, her high principles, her various accomplishments, were so many guarantees for their well-doing ; and as she had never seen, or personally known, Helen Mortimer, however anxious she had been in her enquiries about her, she would naturally accept a trust so reposed in her, with a high sense of the obligations it involved, and a strong feeling in favour of her ill-used brother. It was true, she had serious thoughts of returning to England, for reasons which have been before noticed ; but still, even if her stay in France were but short, her reception of the infants would shield them from infants to second monay, he wa who implor till his mis its compos nant feeling — his follies despised his did not suit

could not em had been gr solved to re
Having reluc feelings of pe
he took his d his arrival. as

blished herself: this estate, from which either he derived his title, or had conferred the title upon the estate, the Count had sold. The Countess, although English born, had grown sufficiently French to disrelish a chateau: to her, Paris was France: out of it, she could not exist. To a mind like hers, what were the beauties of Nature about which she affected to be enthusiastic? What attractions had a life, such as Mrs. Farnham loved to lead, for a woman of the world, eager, and always struggling, to be in the world, and who, having now lost all those personal attractions which she had so misused in early life, seemed determined to repel the approaches of age by fresh excitement and reckless gaiety?

To ensure herself the amusements of society, she had made a society of her own: — she was visited by persons of consideration; and as talent and genius are not exclusively aristocratic or prudish, she contrived to make her salon one of the most agreeable places of resort in Paris. To achieve this great object of her restless life, she had prevailed upon the Count to sell his terres; and from Christmas to Christmas again, Madame St. Alme was home, ready to receive anybody and everybody who were willing to be her guests.

To this woman, and to this house, Mortimer proceeded direct from Beaugency, his mind filled with the horrors which their first interview must produce. In all probability — nay, almost to a certainty, — the English newspapers would have proclaimed the flight of his wife and all the rest of the affair long before he reached Paris. What course the Countess would pursue, or what course he was to pursue towards the Countess, considering what the partner of that flight actually was, he knew not; still the impulse, — infatuation, you will, — was so strong, that he could neither remain with his sister, nor go anywhere else except to the Countess.

The recklessness and desperation with which Mortimer had put himself beyond the reach of any intelligence connected with what he justly considered his misfortunes, but which he also deemed Helen's infidelity, were perfectly characteristic of the man, who, in order to rid his mind of painful associations, went the length of razing to the ground one of the principal ornaments of his park. From all shocks of that kind he had by his arrangements secured himself, until he should arrive in the French capital, whither he had directed his solicitors to transmit his letters, &c.; having written a brief and incoherent note to the Countess, bidding her expect him on a particular day.

That day came, and, true to his purpose, Mortimer was at the door of her hotel within an hour of the appointed time. He had driven thither first, postponing his visit to his bankers, where his letters were awaiting him, until he should have seen the lady whose interests appeared to be so intimately connected with his own.

The reception he met with from her, astonished him: she looked cold, and even angry, but there was nothing of sympathy or agitation in her manner, such as he had anticipated, considering the nature of the crime of which her ungrateful son had been guilty.

“ You know all, I suppose,” said Mortimer, trembling as he spoke.

“ Yes, Mortimer,” replied the Countess, “ and nobody is to blame but your extremely liberal wife.”

“ Aye,” said Mortimer, “ that is often the world’s cant ; — it was said in my case. Have you heard from Francis ?”

“ Yes,” replied the young gentleman’s mother, whose style and tone of conversation, it must be confessed, somewhat confounded her companion. “ He, of course, deprecates my anger, and urges the truism, that what is done cannot be undone ; that his earthly happiness was at stake, and however much the world may blame him, he has made up his mind to all that.”

“ This sounds exceedingly philosophical,” said Mortimer ; “ and does the lady carry herself with equal calmness ?”

“ From her I have not heard,” said the Countess; “but Frank infers, although he does not say so exactly, that Helen had been long aware of his attachment, and whenever he spoke of it to her, her discouragement was not of a nature to make him believe her sincere in her opposition.”

“By Heavens!” said Mortimer, “this is the most extraordinary course of proceeding I ever met with! That he should write this sort of vindictory account to you, is in itself strange enough; but that you should repeat it to me, with a view of calming my resentment or healing my wounded feelings, is marvellous! What possible advantage is to be derived from telling me of Helen’s faults, when the result to which they have led proclaims her guilt with killing clearness?”

“Would you, then,” said the Countess, “have me shut him for ever from my heart for one act of indiscretion?—a deciding one, I own—but can I quite forget that discretion has never been a failing of my own?”

“Good Heavens!” cried Mortimer, “how you talk! You speak as if the step he has taken was one of ordinary occurrence, instead of destroying all chance of my earthly happiness, breaking the holiest ties, and tearing from me what might have been the dear companion of my latter days !”

“ Mortimer !” exclaimed the Countess in her turn, — “ what are you talking of ? I mean that you mean that I should understand that you were really attached to her yourself ?”

“ Attached to her !” said the still wondering husband ; “ if I had not been attached to her, why should I have plighted my vow to her ?—why——”

“ Your vows !” screamed the Countess in an agony of despair :—“ what ! have you been endeavouring to gain her affections ?”

“ Have I not ?” said Mortimer. “ For days, and weeks, and months, my sole object has been to endear myself to her, — to gain her confidence, — in fact, to win her heart — but I have failed. I always felt that I was never fully trusted, — never really loved — and I was right. I have watched her, seen her looks, and heard her gentle words when Frank was by: I have shuddered at the thoughts which the sight and hearing conjured up in my brain. I had not courage to speak,—and now the die is cast.”

“ But, Mortimer,” said the Countess, “ was Frank aware of your extraordinary infatuation ?”

“ I conclude he was,” said Mortimer, — “ and infatuation you well may call it. Having such a wife as Helen, my line of conduct should have been more strict and circumspect.”

“ Why, there,” said the Countess, “ I agree with you ; and the confidence you have now thought proper to make is, considering all things, more astonishing than anything that has yet occurred. It struck me as extremely strange that you should be so greatly affected by these circumstances as to quit Sadgrove, and even England,—just, too, at a moment when your father-in-law’s death was hourly expected.”

“ Death !” said Mortimer, — “ why should he die ? The story of his illness was all a fiction !”

“ But that of his death is not,” said the Countess : — “ he has been dead these ten days.”

“ Dead !” said Mortimer, — “ is he dead ?”

“ Most assuredly,” said the Countess. “ But I cannot in the least comprehend how or why you have remained in ignorance of a fact so important to your family.”

“ Are you certain ?” said Mortimer.

“ Certain,” replied the lady : “ not only has his death been announced in the English newspapers, but Frank mentions it in his letter. He had not himself reached London from his hopeful excursion, — but Helen was with her father when he died. — How long is it since you left home ?”

The mystification which began now to overwhelm Mr. Mortimer, was created, it should be observed, by the extraordinary precautions he had been wise enough to take under the erroneous impression which had been made upon him. In announcing his intended visit to the Countess, he, for reasons perfectly satisfactory to himself, abstained from mentioning his previous visit to his sister, or the removal of his children to her care. His motives for this concealment were, no doubt, equally prudent with all the rest of his conduct connected with the affair; but the effect it produced upon the Countess was such as to leave her in a perfect state of ignorance as to the real cause of his sudden emigration, and make her attribute his journey to Paris to his nervous anxiety with regard to Frank's extraordinary indiscretion in carrying off his wife's waiting-woman.

“Helen with her father when he died!” said Mortimer: — “did they separate, then? — how — what do you mean?”

As we are already aware of everything that has occurred, it is needless to prolong our “report” of the dialogue between Mortimer and his fair friend, “The light of other days.” The reader can easily imagine the state of mind and feelings to which he was reduced, or rather exalted, by the explanation which the Countess gave him. He flew rather than ran to the banker's where his “despatches” were deposited, and there found, amongst his numerous letters, that from Helen which we have before read.

His first impulse, as may be naturally anticipated, was to hurry off to England, and throw himself at Helen's feet in all the bitterness of repentance. How did he curse his rashness, — how denounce his cruel and ungenerous suspicions, — how long to make every atonement for his barbarity, not only to Helen herself, but to her dead father ! and acting upon sudden impulses, had he been left to himself that night would have found him upon his road to England. Unfortunately, he had promised to return to the Countess ; unfortunately that promise he fulfilled ; and in the plenitude of his confidence, — or rather, in the excess of his delight at finding himself relieved from all his horrors, — he gave her Helen's letter to read.

“ And you mean, Mortimer,” said the Countess, when she had finished its perusal, “ to submit yourself to the dominion of the woman who could write this ? What ! are you indeed so fallen, — so lost, that after insults like those she heaps upon you, you will go, and fawn, and cringe, to regain her favour. Believe me, Mortimer, — as I said at first, — this marriage of Frank's, which has led to such extraordinary misunderstandings, was made up by her: she was privy to it, — accessory to it, — in order to inflict a wound on me. Why was I excluded from your house? — why was I shut out, and my boy so gladly received? Why does she hate me? — only because I have your best interests at heart, and because I cannot dissemble. If she is innocent, it is only because she wants courage to be what the world calls guilty."

"If so," said Mortimer, hesitatingly —

"If," said the Countess, — "what if all that you suspect is true! — and if this hateful match has been contrived to blind you to the truth, while it injures us, — what then?"

"But her letter is that of wounded pride, — of conscious rectitude, — of natural indignation," said Mortimer.

"How easy it is to write," said the Countess: "there is no blush in ink, — no falter-then you will means of bring sumed."

"The child
Mortimer.

"Your siste
"why, you ne
sister, whom y who hates me. at once?"

This question
swer to the rea timer did not in destination. Th sister, might be and esteemed b which he could

Mortimer's respect and esteem. It is not to be imagined, considering the terms upon which Mortimer and the Countess were, that she had not seen, or, if not seen, known the contents of Mrs. Farnham's letters, in which she implored him not to make her the associate of his young wife,—it was not, therefore, to be believed that the Countess, now that she saw an opportunity of marrying the happiness which she was not destined to share, would feel less inclined to do her worst, when she found that the children of the man over whom she believed she possessed a commanding interest, had been placed under the care of her bitterest enemy.

“Now,” said Mortimer, — “now the children must be restored to their mother, — their mother restored to her home.”

“Yes,” said the Countess, “if she will condescend to listen to your humble petition; and then the children will be brought up to hate and despise their father, who will be, of course, described to them as an infatuated madman and ——”

“Mad I shall be,” said Mortimer, “if you talk in this manner! I have been mad already: I have injured my excellent Helen.”

“Excellent!” said the Countess, — “oh! excellent, certainly! I have had opportunities enough of appreciating her excellence: — it was excellent in her, was it not, to gloat over the trial in which you were exposed to the public? It was excellent in her to act her part about the fishing-temple! — excellent to go and lament over the wretched Lady Hillingdon’s monument, and make a show of sorrow before the parson and his children! Whenever she has had an opportunity of pointing at your faults, has she not done it? Has she not complained of being left in solitude by the neighbours, who, according to her version of the history, shun your society, and shudder at your name? And, is this the lady to whom you are to supplicate to be taken back into favour, because, by a mistake so natural, that to me it even now seems no mistake at all, you have misapprehended her conduct!”

“ But she is innocent !” said Mortimer.

“ In this instance, probably,” said the Countess. “ Now, follow my advice : — she is evidently determined to take what she thinks a high line, and you and your barbarity are destined to become the topic of general conversation. Make your conditions. You see she refuses your money ; — she separates herself from you : — let the condition be this, — that unless she lowers her tone, and admits the justice of your conduct, — which admission will keep her infinitely more circumspect hereafter, — she shall neither have possession of, nor even see her children. A mother’s feelings nothing can overcome. She loves, — fondly loves those children, — they are hers ; — a mother is always sure of that : — try her upon that point. Where they are they are safe ; — of that you are sure. That you have been wrong, there can be no doubt : put yourself right with the world. If, after your first concession, she remains obdurate, and chooses to destroy at once your happiness and your reputation, punish her ; and you will find that

Upon th sincere,—I solve to act.
left Paris th and started he proceede solved to m and effect a was baffled.
old woman that Mrs. Be after the fune accompanied where they w be back; tha charged; and
ly be let or sol

Batley, the only surviving relation of his wife, he hastened to the counting-house of that worthy personage, — or rather, to that which had once been his counting-house, — for, when he reached the place, he found it occupied by some other person in some other trade; and when he inquired after its late owner, he was told that he had retired from business, and was domesticated in his suburban villa at Walworth.

Thus beaten, Mr. Mortimer resolved upon finding out Mr. Brimmer Brassey, from whom he felt sure he should obtain some tidings of Jacob; and having no exactly defined idea of the geographical position of Walworth, he preferred ordering a hackney-coachman to drive him to Barnard's Inn, which he had never before visited, and at the door of which, looking much like the entrance to a private house, he was deposited.

He managed to find Mr. Brassey's chambers; but when he reached them, the oak was sported, and upon the panels some wag, in imitation of the little notices occasionally so exhibited, of “back in half an hour,” — “return at six,” or others of similar import, had chalked in large letters, — “Gone to America: — call again this day ten years.”

For the solution of this mystery, Mr. Mortimer was indebted to the porter of the “aunciente societie,” who, in reply to his questions, confirmed his worst suspicions, by informing him that B. B. had really bolted, and that a great number of gentlemen had been to look after him, with no better success than the last enquirer. Under these circumstances, which, for many reasons, were by no means of an agreeable nature, Walworth was Mortimer’s only resource; and having procured Jacob’s address from his late town place of business, thither he travelled in a similar conveyance to that in which he had visited the Inn; but here again was he foiled. A little white-haired girl, with weak eyes, a dark frock, and a pinafore, “answered the bell” which Mortimer rang; and coming from the street-door along the paved walk of the little garden in front of the house, with the gate-key in her hand, informed the half mad wife-hunter, that Mr. Batley, "please, sir, was gone abroad."

"Abroad!"

"Yes, please, sir," said Sally, "to America, sir."

"America!" exclaimed Mortimer. "Why, everybody is gone to America."

Whereupon Sally stared, and seeing the road and footpath still thronged with human beings, opined that the gentleman was mad, and rejoiced exceedingly that she had the key still in her hand. Mortimer muttered some unintelligible words, and, resuming his place in Number 583, returned, littered-up as he was, to his hotel, completely "thrown out," and utterly uncertain as to the course he had best pursue.

His next proceeding was to his solicitors: there he found a second letter from Helen, which had been addressed to Sadgrove, in which she stated, that by his silence with regard to the children he had added insult to injury, but that her affection for her infants induced her to humiliate herself to entreat that they might be confided to her charge. The world, which was to judge between them, would, she was sure, justify such a determination on his part equally with hers, — never again to submit herself to his dominion.

This letter, written with more acrimony than the first, occasioned, no doubt, by the imaginary neglect of her former indignant appeal, seemed at once to change the nature of Mortimer's feelings. All that the Countess had said to him on the subject, — all the bitterness with which she had contrived to charge his mind and temper, burst out, and, dashing Helen's letter upon the floor, he stamped upon it, and, clenching his fists in a paroxysm of rage, exclaimed —

“May curses light upon her! She shall never see the children more! Am I to be insulted, — degraded, — bullied? — No! If her proud spirit comes down, and she will accept her income, pay it her; but as for terms, — as for humiliating myself to her, —

it never shall be said that I was so mean, — so abject a wretch ! I have borne much, — suffered much : — but it is over ! — And these, sir,” added he to the solicitor, “ are my final instructions : — no letter of hers will I open — no communication with her will I endure : we are separated eternally ! Let her take what legal measures she may, my children are mine, and never will I part from them. If she applies to you, let this resolution be made known to her ; and although you are aware where the children are, it is my positive command that you never let her know the place of their residence. Her temper may be violent, — her spirit high, — but I will not be trampled upon. This evening I leave England. I shall, in the first place, return to Paris, and thence start for Italy : you will know of my movements, and let me hear what steps this woman takes, — for she is not likely to sit down quietly under what she may think her wrongs. I am determined not to be her creature. Our marriage was altogether a mistake : I mistook her, — she mistook me : — but those who knew her character and disapproved better than she ever permitted me to know have put me upon my guard. She would not establish a grievance. I should have been calm and ready to make every explanation and apology for what has happened;—but no. Her real temper shows itself; and when she indignantly says, ‘no power of entreaty or supplication shall induce her to return to me; no answer, no power or supplication shall induce me to receive her. So, sir, I repeat, you must accept my final decision, and have the goodness to let all that concerns me, to act upon it.’

Here, then, seemed to be the terminus of that connexion which, to those who know the world, never could have produced real happiness. Tempers like those of me and Helen never could have been brought into unison, unless the most perfect compromise had been established between them. This never was the case, we, unfortunately, know, and we also know, that the fault originally lay with Mortimer himself. Helen’s — her entire heart, — which she was and willing to give to the man she loved, — was worth winning; but, — such is the provoking character of our story, and of the principal persons concerned in it, — his own diffidence, or rather mistrust of himself, checked the natural impulse of her candid and confiding nature.

It is now, however, useless to reason, or think, or regret, or repent; the outbreak has happened; and acted upon not less by his own tormenting feelings, than by the atrocious contrivances of others, Mortimer and his wife are parted, — perhaps eternally! — Let us hope not — Such ought not to be the result.

Mortimer, firm in his decision, returned the next day to France, seeming almost to forget, — or perhaps he would have rejoiced, if he could have forgotten, — that such a place as Sadgrove existed. He returned to the Countess. With her and her miserable little husband he remained but a short time; thence he proceeded to Beaugency, and thence to Italy, where he intended to remain for some time, and whither he despatched a letter, inviting his near of the endeavours to timer and Hel approbation w count of his p for the future to the infamou that he left I was a persecute

Helen, who I young mother-i of public inter conversation. E course, most act Lady Mary Sa shoulders, and Blocksford and t

house exactly at the same period with a young man who was generally supposed to be very much attached to her, it had an odd appearance; and that the matter was made little better by his choosing to marry the maid afterwards, — not that she meant anything, by what she said, as applying to any particular person.” Lord Harry merely shook his head, and praised the exceeding good-humour of modern husbands; and Colonel Magnus smiled contemptuously, observing that— “It did not signify much: Mortimer’s loss ought not to break his heart, even if she did ride the high horse, and never came back.”

Helen, when she found out — which she did in time — that Mortimer had left England, and had returned, and left it again, and had written no answer to her letter, which ought to have produced a reply, addressed a third to the solicitor, who, obeying the orders he had received, allowed her to understand that Mr. Mortimer, whatever he might feel as to her innocence with regard to the case in point, would not submit to the course positively her care,

And as the world made again
by him, to place her or accept what of the consciousness amidst the of society;—
deprived of by day, she she had ten bosom,—for pangs, and fe
it would have already taught to lisp the word “father,” and in whose countenance she saw that father’s features likened,—to have these darlings torn from her,—to be exiled from her rightful home,—to be made as much an outcast as he that she had dearly loved could make her:—surely, this was enough to break the stoutest heart!

Helen, after having received the answer to her last communication with the solicitors, almost repented of the warmth and violence of language in which it had been couched. The children were all to her; but it was now too late. Her disdain of the infamous allegations against her character, disproved as they were, had engendered the hatred of her husband, and all hope of reconciliation was destroyed. The liberal members of society looked cold upon Mrs. Mortimer; her husband was pitied; the escape of the children was considered providential; and without one friend upon earth to espouse her cause, except her young mother-in-law, she quitted London, and once be

It is most circumstances of cause, and nevertheless, ration betwee
although mutu
had interfered, her proud spi
his resentment cause, let it be ing displayed i borative of his of him. Magni
nent, and there had followed Br
having recovered

his return to England, muddled away the rest of his life at his miserable house in Walworth, where he ended his days; and having inexorably refused to make a will, which, with his own knowledge, could possibly benefit anybody upon earth, died intestate; and the wreck of his property, amounting to some forty thousand pounds, devolved upon Helen, as next of kin.

The few people who remembered the once charming Helen Batley, now and then gave themselves the trouble of wondering what had begone with her. It was altogether a curious story, and the marriage of Mr. Blocksford with the maid was a curious story; but Mr. and Mrs. Blocksford were an extremely happy couple, and the Countess St. Alme had departed (we hope) to a better world! Frank had one son, with every probability of a further increase to his family; so that our register of Births, Deaths, and Marriages has not been ill kept.

Mrs. Farnham, after a year's residence at Beaugency, rather, perhaps, under the in-after a long try; but I possessed it not only for admirers of but by the and compan lected, after well adapted head, a town before describ bably, to the beautiful in situated on th which, bounde has, in the fresh brightness, deli

timer and his beautiful little sister, Rosa, grew in grace and loveliness ; and never did father more anxiously feel for the happiness and advancement of his children than Mortimer, who, amidst all his dreadful passions, possessed the affections of paternity in the highest degree.— Judge, then, what was his horror at hearing, by express, at Milan, from his sister, that both his darlings had been attacked by small-pox of the most virulent nature, which was raging in the place. In these days of expeditious journeys the news, — which, being bad, proverbially travelled fast enough, — was not long in reaching him. Strange, to be sure, are the conformation and construction of the human mind ! He whose proud spirit, brought in opposition to the prouder spirit of his wife, would not listen to the proposition of a reconciliation, even if she would have listened to it, raved with horror at hearing of the danger of those children which were hers as well as his. Not an instant did he lose : one hour was not suffered to elapse before he start-garded his dear children, drove from his mind the memory of all other things.

[illegible]

Mrs. Farnham received him with warmth and kindness, and Mortimer found relief in a flood of tears. It is a triumph to see a sinner weep; and if this Mortimer, who had permitted the best of wives, — whatever her own high spirit might have led her to do, — had only felt towards her as he ought to have felt, the widowed feeling of paternal love which he now experienced would have been spared him, and all the evils which had been accumulated on his head would have been supplanted by those blessings which never can be bestowed on a husband but by the affectionate love of a virtuous wife, and her tender cares as a devoted mother.

“ My beloved sister,” said Mortimer, “ the children are safe !”

“ Yes, Mortimer,” replied Mrs. Farnham. “ They have been dreadfully — dangerously ill !”

“ Their unhappy mother knew nothing of it,” said Mortimer; “ at least, I thank God

7
sake, let me s

“ Francis

Farnham ; “

danger, not en

But I must t in a great de about four or spectable pers

gant and grace

a Mrs. Miles,

nursery-govern

engage her. S a child of her devote herself

such kindness,

When the chil

forfeited some of “ How shall I ever repay her !” said Mortimer.

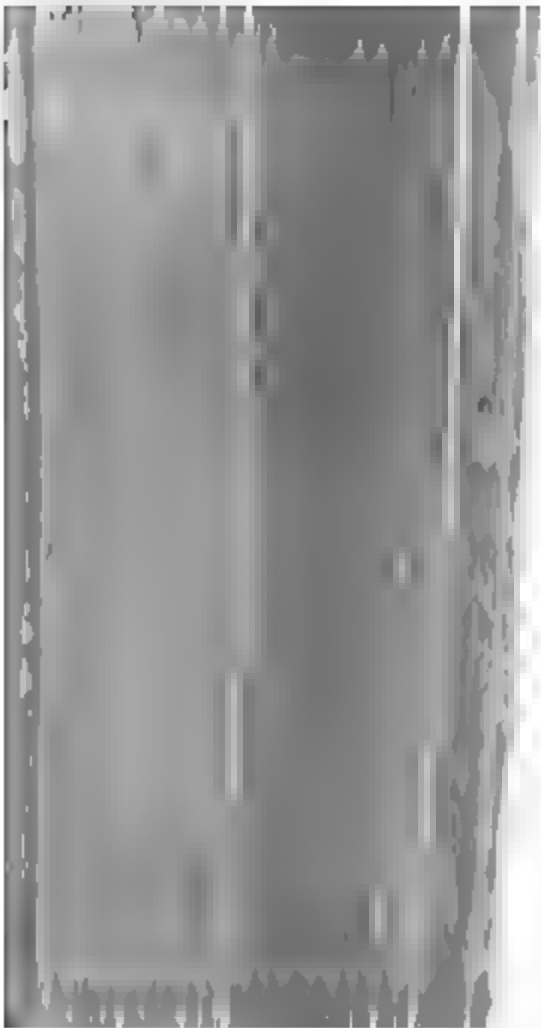

“ Ah,” said Mrs. Farnham, “ I fear you will never have the power. The children are now with her,—they will not quit her ; but, during her constant attendance on them, she has caught the dreadful infection, and the medical men have pronounced her recovery hopeless. In fact, she is, as I believe, at this moment in the agonies of death !”

“ How dreadful !” said Mortimer. “ Oh ! let her live, that I may breathe my prayers of gratitude for her.”

“ It must be speedily then,” said Mrs. Farnham ; “ a little time, I am afraid, will end the painful scene. Come—come !”

Mortimer followed her : his children, as it were instinctively, ran to him, when he entered the room in which they were ; and although still disfigured by the effects of the dreadful disorder, were evidently convalescent : he clasped them to his heart, and covered them with kisses.

The physician, who stood near the bed in

Mortimer, grateful than salvation of I side. He spe
ing all her ei raised herself agitation, mut
"Thank G knows my inn duty to my ch
"What do
"HELEN!" s fell against his

